The History of Rome

1870

Librarian

Uttarpara Joykrishna Public Library
Govt. of West Bengal

loaded with chains. He then ordered that the bodies BOOK of his own men should be collected, from among the heaps of the enemy, and buried; directing, at Y.R. 535. the same time, that the body of Flaminius should B.C. 217. be fought for, with intention to honour him with a funeral; but after a most diligent search, it could not be found. As foon as the first news of this difafter arrived at Rome, the people, in great terror and tumult, crowded together into the Forum. The matrons, running up and down the streets, asked every one who came in their way, what sudden calamity was faid to have happened; in what state was the army? At length, after arrowd, not less numerous than that of a full affembly of the people, had collected in the Comitium, and about the fenate-house, calling on the magistrates for information, a little before fun-fet, Marcus Pomponius, the prætor, told them, "We have been defeated in a great battle." Though nothing more particular was heard from him, yet the people, catching up rumours, one from another, returned to their houses with accounts, that, "the conful was flain, together, " with a great part of his army; that few furvivede " and that these were either dispersed through "Etheria, or taken by the enemy." Every kind of misfortune, which had ever befallen vanquisugh troops, was now pictured in the anxious min after those, whose relations had served under the centry. Caius Flaminius, having no positive informaticg rewhich they could found either hope or During the next, and feveral fucceeding days, or multitude, composed of rather more women this men, stood round the gates, watching for the arri either of their friends, or of some who might gue. intelligence concerning them; and whenever any person came up, they crowded about him with eager inquiries; nor could they be prevailed on to retire, especially from such as were of their acquaintance.

BOOK quaintance, until they had examined minutely into XXII. eyery particular. Then, when they did separate from about the informants, might be feen their B.C. 217. countenances expressive of various emotions, according as the intelligence, which each received, was pleafing or unfavourable; and numbers, furrounding them, returned to their houses offering either congratulations or comfort. Among the women, particularly, the effects both of joy and grief were very conspicuous; one, as we are told, meeting, unexpectedly, at the very gate, her fon returning safe, expired at the sight of him: another, who facin her house, overwhelmed with grief, in consequence of a false report of her son's death, on feeing that fon returning, died immediately, through excess of joy. The prætors, during feveral days, kept the fenate affembled in their house, from the rising to the setting of the sun, deliberating by what commander, or with what forces, opposition could be made to the victorious Carthaginians.

> VIII. Before they had fully determi on the plans to be purfued, they received an t of another unexpected disaster: four thous. , who had been fent by Servilius, the comus, to aid of his colleague, under the command of s Centenius, pro-prætor, were cut off by Han-, in Umbria, whither, on hearing of the fight he Trasimenus, they had marched to avoid The news of this event affected people difently: fome, having their minds occupied by of, for misfortunes of a momentous kind, certainly emed the recent loss of the cavalry light, in comarison: others judged not of the accident by its vn intrinsic importance; but considered, that, as an a fickly constitution, a slight cause is attended with more fenfible effects, than a more powerful one in a constitution possessed of vigour; so any kind of BOOK misfortune, happening to the commonwealth in its XXII. present debilitated condition, ought to be estimated, Y.R.535. not by the magnitude of the affair itself, but by B.C. 217. the enfeebled state of the same, which could not endure any degree of aggravation to its distresses. Accordingly, the state had recourse to a remedy, which for a long time past had neither been used nor wanted, the nomination of a dictator: and because the conful, who alone was supposed to possess the power of nominating that officer, was abroad, and it was difficult to fend either messenger or letter, through those parts of Italy, occupied, as they were, by the Carthaginian arms; and as the people could not create a dictator, no precedent having yet existed for it, they therefore, in an assembly, created a pro-dictator, Quintus Fabius Maximus, and a master of the horse, Marcus Minucius Rufus. These received a charge from the fenate, to strengthen the walls and towers of the city; to post troops in proper places, and to break down the bridges on the rivers; fince, having proved unequal to the defence of Italy, they re a gight at their own doors in defence of the cityad that Ltauria.

12. Hannibal marched straight forward, through Umbria, as far as Spoletum; which town, after he had utterly wasted all the adjoining country, he attempted to take by ftorm; but, being repulsed, with the loss of a great number of men, and judging, from the strength of that single or lony, his attempt on which had ended fo little to his advantage, what great difficulties he had furmount, before he could master the city of Rome, he changed the direction of his route toward the territory of Picenum, which not only abounded with provisions of all forts, but was, besides; well stored with booty, which his needy and rapacious foldiers greedily feized. There he remained, during feveral days,

Y.R.535.

BOOK days, in one fixed post, and refreshed his men, who had been severely fatigued by their long marches in the winter feafon, and through the marshes, as well B.C. 217. as by the battle, which, though favourable in the iffue, was not gained without danger and fatigue. After allowing fufficient rest to his troops, who, however, delighted more in plundering and ravaging, than in ease and repose, he put them in motion, and spread devastation through the territories of Prætulia and Adria, the country of the Marsians, Manucinians, and Pelignians, and the neighbouring tract of Apulia, round Arpi and Luceria. The conful, Cneius Servilius, had fought fome flight battles with the Gauls, and taken one town of no great confequence; when, hearing of the difaster of his colleague, and the troops under his command, and being filled with apprehensions for the capital of his country, he refolved not to be out of the way, in a conjecture of fuch extreme danger; he therefore marched directly towards Rome. Quintus Fabius Maximus, dictator, a fecond time, on the day wherein he entered into office, affembled the fenate, when he commenced his administration with attention to the gods. Having proved, to the conviction of the affembly t the faults committed by Caius Flaminius, tork ful, through his neglect of the established of the rites, and the auspices, were even greated than those which arose from his rashness and want of judgment; and that it was necessary to learn, from the gods themselves, what atonements would appeale beir wrath, he prevailed on them to pais an order, which was not usual, except when some terrible proigies were announced, that the decemvirs should confult the Sibylline leaves. Thefe, after inspecting those books of the fates, reported to the senate, that, " the vow made to Mars, on occasion of the " part war, had not been duly fulfilled; that it "must be performed anew, and that in a more ample manner; that the great games must be " vowed

" vowed to Jupiter; and temples to Venus Erycina BOOK " and Mens; that a supplication and lectisternium "must be performed, and a facred spring vowed, Y.R.535. " in case success attended their arms, and that the B.C. 217. " commonwealth remained in the same state in " which it had been when the war began." The fenate, confidering that Fabius would have full employment in the management of the war, ordered that Marcus Æmilius, the prætor, should take care, that all these matters might be performed in due time, according to the directions of the college of pontiffs.

X. On the passing of these decrees of the senate, the chief pontiff, Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, being advised with by the college of prætors, gave his opinion, that before any other steps were taken, the people should be consulted with respect to the facred fpring; for that a vow of that import could not be made without their order. Accordingly, the question was proposed to the people in these words: "Do ye choose and order, that what I am going to " propose, shall be performed in this manner: that, " ty, le the commonwealth of the Roman people, Expuirites, shall (as I wish it may) be preserved during the next five years, from these nely, the war which subsists between "the Roman people and the Carthaginians; and " the wars subsisting with the Gauls, who dwell on " this fide of the Alps; then the Roman people, the "Quirites, shall present, as an offering, whatever " the fpring shall produce, from the herds of swine, " sheep, goats, or oxen; of which produce, ac-" cruing from the day when the senate and people " shall appoint, whatever shall not have been appro-" priated by confecration, shall be facrificed to Ju-" piter. Let him who makes the offering, make it " at what time, and in what form he shall choose: " in whatfoever manner he does it, let the offering be BOOK " deemed proper: if that which ought to be facri-

XXII. " ficed die, let it be deemed as unconfecrated; and " let no guilt ensue. If any person undesignedly Y.R. 535. " shall break, or kill it, let him incur no penalty. " If any shall steal it, let not guilt be imputed to the " people, nor to him from whom it is stolen. If any, " unknowingly, offer the facrifice on a forbidden " day, let the offering be deemed good. Whether "the offering shall be made by night or by day, " whether by a freeman or a flave, let it be " deemed good. If the fenate and people shall order it to be made on an earlier day than a " person shall make it, let the people be acquitted, " and free from the guilt thereof." On the same account, a vow was made to celebrate the great games, at the expence of three hundred and thirtythree thousand three hundred and thirty-three affes and one third *; befides three hundred oxen to be offered to Jupiter; and white oxen, and other victims, to many other deities. The vows being duly made, a proclamation was issued for a supplication, in the performance of which joined, not only the inhabitants of the city, with their wives and children, but also those of the country, who, having any property of their own, were interested in the welfare of the public. Then was performed the lectifiernium, during the space of three days, under the direction of the decemvirs of religious rites. There were fix couches exhibited to view, one for Jupiter and Juno, another for Neptune and Minerva, a third for Mars and Venus, a fourth for Apollo and Diana, a fifth for Vulcan and Vesta, and the fixth for Mercury and Ceres. The temples were then vowed; that to Venus Erycina, by Quintus Fabius Maximus, dictator; for fuch was the direction found in the books of the fates, that the person who held the highest authority in the state should vow it. Titus Otacilius, the prætor, vowed B O K the temple to Mens.

^{* 1,076}l. 18. 6d.

XI. The business relating to religion being thus B.C. 21% concluded, the dictator then proposed to the senate, to take into confideration the state of the commonwealth and the war; and to determine how many, and what legions, should be employed to stop the progress of the victorious enemy. They passed a decree, that " he should receive the army from the " conful, Cneius Servilius; in addition to which, "he should levy, among the citizens and allies, " fuch numbers of horse and foot as he should judge " requisite; and, in every other particular, should " act and manage in such a manner as he should see " conducive to the public good." Fabius declared his intention to make an addition of two legions to the army of Servilius; these he ordered to be levied by the mafter of the horse, and appointed a day on which they were to affemble at Tibur. Then, having published a proclamation, that those who dwelt in towns or forts which were incapable of defence, should remove into places of fafety; and that all the inhabitants of that tract, through which Hannibal was to march, should likewise remove out of the country, after first burning the houses, and destroying the fruits of the earth, to prevent his meeting any kind of supply; he himself set out, by the Flaminian road, to meet the conful and the army. Coming within fight of the troops, on their march on the bank of the Tiber, near Ocriculum, and observing the conful, with some horsemen, advancing, he fent a beadle to acquaint him, that he must approach the dictator without lictors. This order he obeyed; and their meeting raifed an exalted idea of the dictatorship in the minds both of citizens and allies; who had now, in confequence of the long disuse, almost forgotten that office. Here he received a letter from the city, with in-C 2 telligence, XXII. public, to call the dictator fluggish instead of cool; XXII. timid instead of cautious; imputing to him as faults what had the nearest affinity to virtues. Thus, by the practice of depressing the merit of his superior,—a practice of the basest nature, and which has become too general, in consequence of the favourable success so often attending it,—he exalted himself.

XIII. Hannibal led away his forces from the territory of Arpi into Samnium, ravaged the lands of Beneventum, took the city of Telesia, and used every means to irritate the Roman general; in hopes that by fo many indignities, and the fufferings of his allies, he might be provoked to hazard an engagement on equal ground. Among the multitude of the allies of Italian birth, who had been made prisoners by the Carthaginian at Trasimenus, and fet at liberty, were three Campanian horsemen. Hannibal on that occasion, by many prefents and promifes, engaged them to conciliate the affections of their countrymen in his favour. These now informed him, that if he brought his army into Campania, he would have an opportunity of getting possession of Capua. The affair was of much moment, and feemed to demand more weighty authority. Hannibal hefitated, inclining at one time to confide in their affurances, at another to distrust them, yet they brought him to a refolution of marching from Samnium into Campania; and he dismissed them, with repeated charges to fulfil their promises by deeds, and with orders to return to him with a greater number and with some of their principal men. He then commanded his guide to conduct him into the territory of Casinum; having learned from persons acquainted with the country, that if he feized on the pass there, the Romans would be shut out, so as to prevent their bringing succour to their allies. But speaking with the Carthaginian accent, and mil-pronouncing the BOOK Latin words, the guide milapprehended him as having said Casilinum instead of Casinum; so that, Y.R.535. turning from the right road, he led him through B.C. 217. the territories of Allifæ, Calatia, and Cales, down into the plain of Stella. Here Hannibal looking round, and perceiving the place inclosed between mountains and rivers, called the guide, and asked him where he was; and the other answering, that he would lodge that night at Casilinum, he at last discovered the mistake, and that Casinum lay at a very great distance, in a quite different direction. On this, having scourged and crucified the guide, in order to strike terror into others, he pitched and fortified his camp, and dispatched Maharbal, with the cavalry, to ravage the territory of Falerii. Here the depredations were carried as far as the waters of Sinuessa, the Numidians committing dreadful devaltations, and spreading fear and consternation to a still wider extent. Yet did not this terror, great as it was, and though their whole country was involved in the flames of war, induce the allies to fwerve from their allegiance. They had no defire to change their rulers, for they lived under a mild and equitable government; and there is no bond of loyalty fo strong.

the

XIV. The Carthaginians encamped at the river Vulturnus, and the most delightful tract in Italy was feen wasted with fire, the country-feats on every fide fmoking in ruins. While Fabius led his army along the tops of the Massic mountains, the discontent in it was inflamed anew, and to fuch a degree, as to fall little short of a mutiny. During a few days past, as their march had been conducted with more expedition than usual, they had been in good temper, because they had supposed that this haste was owing to an intention to protect Campania from further ravages. But when they had gained the heights,

C 4

BOOK heights, and the enemy appeared under their eyes, XXII. fetting fire to the houses of the Falernian district, with Y.R.535. the colony of Sinuessa, and that still no mention was B.C.217. made of fighting, Minucius exclaimed, "Are we " come hither to view the burning and flaughter of " our allies, as to a spectacle grateful to the sight? "If no other circumstance strikes us with shame, do " we feel none with regard to these our countryes men, whom our fathers sent as colonists to "Sinuessa, to secure this frontier from the inroads " of the Samnites? And now the frontier is wasted " with fire, not by the Samnites, a neighbouring " state, but by Carthaginians, a foreign race, who, from the remotest limits of the world, have effected "their progress hither, in consequence of our " dilatory and flothful proceedings. Shamefully " are we degenerated from our ancestors, who con-" fidered it as an affront to their government, if a " Carthaginian fleet happened to fail along this " coast; for we now behold the same coast filled " with the enemy's troops, and possessed by Moors " and Numidians. We, who lately felt fuch in-" dignation at fiege being laid to Saguntum that "we appealed, not only to mankind, but to treaties " and to the gods, now look on without emotion, " while Hannibal is scaling the walls of a Roman " colony. The fmoke from the burning houses and " lands is carried into our eyes and mouths; our " ears ring with the cries and lamentations of our "allies, invoking our aid oftener than that of the " immortal gods; yet, hiding ourselves here in woods " and clouds, we lead about our army like a herd " of cattle, through shady forests and desert paths. " If Marcus Furius had adopted the defign of refcuing " the city from the Gauls, by the fame means by " which this new Camillus, this dictator of fuch fin-" gular abilities, felected for us in our diftreffes, " intends to recover Italy from Hannibal, (that is, " by traverfing mountains and forests,) Rome would BOOK " now be the property of the Gauls; and great XXII. " reason do I see to dread, if we persevere in this Y.R.535. "dilatory mode of acting, that our ancestors have B.C.217. " fo often preserved it for Hannibal and the Cartha-"ginians. But he, who had the spirit of a man, " and of a true Roman, during the very day on "which the account was brought to Veii, of his " being nominated dictator, by direction of the " fenate, and order of the people, though the Jani-" culum was of fufficient height, where he might " fit and take a prospect of the enemy, came down "to the plain; and, on that fame day, in the " middle of the city, where now are the Gallic " piles, and on the day following, on the road to "Gabii, cut to pieces the legions of the Gauls. "What! when many years after this, at the Cau-"dine forks, we were fent under the yoke by the "Samnites; was it by traverling the mountains of "Samnium, or was it by prefling briskly the fiege " of Luceria, and compelling the enemy to fight, " that Lucius Papirius Curfor removed the yoke "from the necks of the Romans, and imposed it " on the haughty Samnites? In a late case, what " but quick dispatch gave victory to Caius Lutatius? "For on the next day after he came in view of " the enemy, he overpowered their fleet, heavily " laden with provisions, and encumbered with their " own implements and cargoes. To imagine that, " by fitting still, and offering up prayers, the war " can be brought to a conclusion, is folly in the " extreme. Forces must be armed, must be led " out to the open field, that you may encounter, " man with man. By boldness and activity, the "Roman power has been raised to its present " height, and not by these sluggish measures, " which cowards term cautious." While Minucius harangued in this manner, as if to a general affembly, he was furrounded by a multitude of tribunes and

Y.R.535. B.C. 217.

BOOK and Roman horsemen; and his presumptuous expressions reached even the ears of the common men. who gave evident demonstrations, that if the matter were submitted to the votes of the soldiery. they would prefer Minucius, as a commander, to Fabius.

> XV. Fabius watched the conduct of his own men with no less attention than that of the enemy; determined to shew, with respect to them, in the first place, that his resolution was unalterable by any thing which they could fay or do. He well knew that his dilatory measures were severely cenfured, not only in his own camp, but likewise at Rome, yet he perfifted, with inflexible fleadiness, in the same mode of conduct during the remainder of the fummer; in consequence of which, Hannibal, finding himself disappointed in his hopes of an engagement, after having tried his utmost endeavours to bring it about, began to look round for a convenient place for his winter-quarters: for the country where he then was, though it afforded plenty for the present, was incapable of furnishing a lasting supply, because it abounded in trees and vineyards, and other plantations of fuch kinds as minister 14ther to pleasure than to men's necessary demands. Of this his intention, Fabius received information from fcouts; and knowing, with a degree of certainty, that he would return through the same pass by which he had entered the Falernian territory, he detached parties of moderate force to take possession of Mount Callicula, and Cafilinum, which city, being intersected by the river Vulturnus, is the boundary between the Falernian and Campanian territories. He himself led back his army along the fame eminences over which he had come, fending out Lucius Hostilius Mancinus, with four hundred horsemen of the allies, to procure intelligence. This young man, who had often made one of the crowd of listeners to the presumptuous BOOK harangues of the master of the horse, proceeded, at first, as the commander of a party of observation Y.R. 535. ought, watching, from safe ground, the motions of B.C. 217. the enemy: afterwards, feeing the Numidians scattered about through the villages, and having, on an opportunity that offered, flain fome of them, his whole mind was instantly occupied by the thoughts of fighting, and he loft all recollection of the orders of the dictator, who had charged him to advance only fo far as he might with fafety, and to retreat before he should come within the enemy's fight. Several different parties of the Numidians, by skirmishing and retreating, drew him on almost to their camp, by which time both his men and horses were greatly fatigued. Here Cartalo, commander-in-chief of the cavalry, advancing in full career, obliged his party to fly before he came within a dart's throw, and, almost without relaxing in speed, purfued them in their flight through the length of five miles. Mancinus, when he faw that the enemy did not defift from their pursuit, and that there was no prospect of escaping, exhorted his men to act with courage, and faced about on the foe, though fuperior to him in every particular. The consequence was, that he, and the bravest of his party, were furrounded, and cut to pieces: the rest, betaking themselves to a precipitate flight, made their escape, first to Cales, and thence, by ways almost impassable, to the dictator. It happened that, on the fame day, Minucius rejoined Fabius, having been fent to fecure. by a body of troops, a woody hill, which, above Tarracina, forms a narrow defile, and hangs over the fea; because it was apprehended, that, if that barrier of the Appian way were left unguarded, the Carthaginian might penetrate into the territory of Rome. The dictator and matter of the horse, having re-united their forces, marched down into the road, through which Hannibal was

BOOK to pass. At this time the enemy were two miles XXII. distant.

Y.R.535. B.C.217.

XVI. Next day the Carthaginians, marching forward, filled the whole road which lay between the two camps; and though the Romans had taken post close to their own rampart, with an evident advantage of fituation, yet the Carthaginian advanced with his light horsemen, and, in order to provoke the enemy, made feveral skirmishing attacks, charging, and then retreating. The Romans kept their position, and the fight proceeded without vigour, more agreeably to the wish of the dictator than to that of Hannibal. Two hundred Romans, and eight hundred of the enemy, fell. There was now reason to think, that by the road to Casilinum being thus blockaded, Hannibal was effectually pent up; and that while Capua and Samnium, and fuch a number of wealthy allies at their back, should furnish the Romans with supplies, the Carthaginian, on the other hand, would be obliged to winter between the rocks of Formiæ, the fands of Linternum, and horrid stagnated marshes. Nor was Hannibal infenfible that his own arts were now played off against himself. Wherefore, seeing it impracticable to make his way through Cafilinum, and that he must direct his course to the mountains, and climb over the fummit of the Callicula, left the Romans should fall on his troops in their march, when entangled in the vallies, he devised a stratagem for baffling the enemy by a deception calculated to inspire terror, resolving to set out secretly in the beginning of the night, and proceed toward the mountains. The means which he contrived for the execution of his plan were these: collecting combustible matters from all the country round, he caused bundles of rods and dry twigs to be tied fast on the horns of oxen, great numbers of which, trained and untrained, he drove along with him, among the other fpoil fpoil taken in the country, and he made up the num- BOOK ber of almost two thousand. He then gave in wharge XXII. to Hasdrubal, that as soon as the darkness of the Y.R.535. night came on, he should drive this numerous herd, B.C.217. after first setting fire to their horns, up the mountains, and particularly, if he found it practicable, over the passes where the enemy kept guard.

XVII. As foon as it grew dark the army decamped in filence, driving the oxen at some distance before the van. When they arrived at the foot of the mountains and the narrow roads, the fignal was instantly given that fire should be set to the horns of the oxen, and that they should be driven violently up the mountains in front; when their own fright, occasioned by the flame blazing on their heads, together with the heat, which foon penetrated to the quick and to the roots of their horns, drove them on as if goaded by madness. By their spreading about in this manner all the bushes were quickly in a blaze, just as if fire had been fet to the woods and mountains, and the fruitless tofling of their heads ferving to increase the flames, they afforded an appearance as of men running up and down on every fide. The troops stationed to guard the passage of the defiles, seeing several fires on the tops of the mountains, concluded they were furrounded, and quitted their post, taking the way, as the fafest course, towards the summits, where they faw fewest fires blazing. Here they fell in with feveral of the oxen, which had fcattered from the herds to which they belonged. At first, when they saw them at a distance, imagining that they breathed out flames, they halted in utter aftonishment at the miraculous appearance; but afterwards, when they discovered that it was an imposition of human contrivance, and believing that they were in danger of being enfnared, they hastily, and with redoubled terror, betook themselves to flight.

Y R.535 B.C. 217.

BOOK flight. They met also the enemy's light infantry, XXII. but night intpiring equal fears, prevented either from beginning a fight until day-light. In the mean time Hannibal led his whole army through the defile, where he furprifed fome Romans in the very pass, and pitched his camp in the territory of Allifæ.

> XVIII. Fabius perceived the tumult; but, sufpecting fome fnare, and being utterly averse from fighting, in the night particularly, he kept his men within their trenches. As foon as day appeared, a fight commenced near the fummit of the mountain, in which the Romans, who had confiderably the advantage in numbers, would have eafily overpowered the light infantry of the enemy, separated as they were from their friends, had not a cohort of Spaniards, fent back by Hannibal for the purpose, come up to the spot. These, both by reason of the agility of their limbs, and the nature of their arms, being lighter and better qualified for skirmishing among rocks and cliffs (to which they were accustomed), by their manner of fighting, eafily baffled the enemy, who were used to act on plain ground in steady fight, and who carried weighty arms. After a contest therefore, by no means equal, they both withdrew to their respective camps; the Spaniards with almost all their men fafe, the Romans with the lofs of many. Fabius likewise decamped, and passing through the defile, feated himself in a high and strong post above Allifæ. Hannibal, now counterfeiting an intention to proceed to Rome through Samnium, marched back as far as the country of the Pelignians, fpreading devastation every where as he went. Fabius led his army along the heights, between the route of the enemy and the city of Rome, confidently attending his motions, but never giving him dimeeting. From the territory of Pelignum, Hanning altered his route; and, directing his march back towards Apulia, came to Gerunium, a city BOOK whose inhabitants had abandoned it, being terrified XXII. by a part of the walls having fallen in ruins. The Y.R.535. dictator formed a strong camp in the territory of B.C.217. Larinum; and, being recalled thence to Rome, on account of fome religious ceremonies, he pressed the master of the horse not only with orders, but with earnest advice, and almost with prayers, to " confide more in prudence than in fortune; and " to imitate his conduct in command rather than "that of Sempronius and Flaminius. Not to " think there had been no advantage gained, in " having foiled the defigns of the Carthaginian "through almost the whole length of the summer; " observing, that even physicians sometimes effect "their purpose better by rest than by motion "and action; that it was a matter of no small " importance, to have ceased to be defeated by an " enemy so inured to victory; and, after a long "course of disasters, to have gained time to " breathe." After urging these cautions, which were thrown away on the master of the horse, he set out for Rome.

XIX. In the beginning of the fummer wherein these transactions passed, the operations of the war commenced in Spain also, both by land and sea. Haldrubal, to the number of ships which he had received from his brother, manned and in readiness for service, added ten; and giving the command of this fleet of forty ships to Himilco, set out from New Carthage, marching his army along the shore, while the fleet failed on, at a small distance from the land; fo that he was prepared to fight on either element, as the foe should come in his way. Cneises Scipio, on hearing that the enemy had moved from their winter-quarters, at first designed to purfue the same plan of operations; but, afterwards, on hearing that they had been joined by valk num-

BOOK bers of new auxiliaries, he judged it not so prudent to meet them on land; fending, therefore, on board his ships, an additional number of chosen foldiers, Y.R. 535. he put to fea, with a fleet of thirty-five fail. On the B.C. 217. next day after his leaving Tarraco, he arrived at an harbour within ten miles of the mouth of the river Iberus, and dispatching thence two Massilian scoutboats, learned from them, that the Carthaginian fleet lay in the mouth of that river, and that their camp was pitched on the bank. Intending therefore, by a general attack with his whole force, at once to overpower the enemy, while unprovided and off their guard, he weighed anchor, and advanced towards them. They have, in Spain, a great many towers built in lofty fituations, which are uled both as watch-towers, and as places of defence against From these the Roman sleet was first descried, and notice given of it to Hasdrubal. caused much confusion in the camp on land, and fomewhat earlier than the alarm reached the ships, where they had not heard the dashing of oars, nor any other noise usually accompanying a fleet. capes, likewise, shut out the enemy from their view, when on a fudden, while they were rambling about the shore, or fitting quietly in their tents, expecting nothing less than the approach of an enemy, or a fight on that day, feveral horsemen, dispatched by Hasdrubal, came one after another, with orders for them to go on board instantly, and get ready their arms, for that the Roman fleet was just at the mouth of the harbour. These orders the horsemen, sent for the purpose, conveyed to every part; and presently Hasdrubal himself arrived with the main body of the army. Every place was now filled with noise and inult: the rowers and foldiers hurrying to their mips, like men making their escape from land rather than going to battle. Scarcely had all got on board when some of the vessels, having untied the hawfers at the sterns, were carried foul of their anchors. *

anchors. Every thing was done with too much hurry BOOK and precipitation, so that the business of the mari- XXII. ners was impeded by the preparations of the foldiers, Y.R.535. and the foldiers were prevented from taking and B.C. 217. preparing their arms by the buftle and confusion of the mariners. The Romans, by this time, were not only drawing nigh, but had already formed their ships in order of battle. The Carthaginians, therefore, falling into the utmost disorder, to which the enemy's attack contributed not more than the confusion prevailing among themselves, tacked about, and fled; and as the mouth of the river, to which they steered their course, did not afford an entrance to fuch an extensive line, and as fuch numbers crowded in together, their ships were driven on shore; many striking on banks, others on the dry strand. The foldiers made their escape, some with their arms, others without them, to their friends, who were drawn up on the shore. However, in the first encounter, two Carthaginian ships were taken, and four funk.

XX. The Romans, without hesitation, pursued their difmayed fleet, notwithstanding that the land was possessed by the enemy, and that they saw a line of their troops under arms, stretched along the whole shore; and all the ships which had either shattered their prows by striking against the shore, or stuck their keels fast in the fand banks, they tied to their sterns and towed out into the deep. Out of the forty ships they took twenty-sive. most brilliant circumstance attending their victory was, that by this one battle, which cost them fo little, they were rendered masters of the sea along the whole extent of that coast. Sailing forward, therefore, to Honoica, they there made a descent, took the city by storm, and sacked it. Thence they proceeded to Carthage, and, after wasting all the country round, at last set fire to the houses contiguous to

the

BOOK the very walls and gates. The ships, now heavily XXII. laden with booty, went on to Longuntica, where a great quantity of okum*, for cordage, had been Y.R 535. collected by Hasdrubal for the use of the fleet. Of this they carried off as much as they had occafion for, and burned the rest. Nor did they carry their operations along the open coasts of the continent only, but passed over to the island of Ebusa, where they in vain attempted, during two days, and with their utmost efforts, to gain possession of the capital city. Perceiving, however, that they were wasting time to no purpose, and in pursuit of a hopeless design, they applied themselves to the ravaging of the country; and after plundering and burning feveral towns, and collecting a greater quantity of booty than they had acquired on the continent, they retired on board their ships; at which time ambaffadors came to Scipio, from the Balearick Isles, fuing for peace. From this place the fleet failed back, and returned to the hither parts of the province, whither ambaffadors hastily slocked from all the nations adjacent to the Iberus, and from many even of the remotest parts of Spain. The whole number of states, which submitted to the dominion and government of Rome, and gave hostages, amounted to more than one hundred and twenty. Wherefore the Roman general, relying now with fufficient confidence on his land forces also, advanced as far as the pass of Castulo; on which Hasdrubal withdrew toward the ocean into Lufitania.

> XXI. It was now supposed that the remainder of the summer would pass without farther action; and this would have been the case, had it depended on the Carthaginians; but, besides that the native Spaniards are in their temper restless and fond of change, Mandonius and Indibilis, (the latter of BOOK whom had formerly been chieftain of the Ilergetans,) as foon as the Romans retired from the Y.R. 535. pass toward the sea-coast, roused their countrymen B.C. 217. to arms, and made predatory irruptions into the peaceful territories of the Roman allies. Against these Scipio sent some military tribunes, with a body of light-armed auxiliaries; and these, without much difficulty, routed all their tumultuary bands, flaying and taking many, and difarming the greater part of them. This commotion, however, drew back Hafdrubal, from his march toward the ocean, to the hither side of the Iberus, for the purpose of supporting his confederates. The Carthaginians lay encamped in the territory of Ilercao, the Romans at a place called Newfleet, when a fudden piece of intelligence diverted the war to another quarter: the Celtiberians, who of all the states in that tract were the first who fent ambassadors, and gave hostages to the Romans, had, in consequence of instructions sent by Scipio, taken up arms, and invaded the province of the Carthaginians with a powerful army, had reduced three towns by affault, and had afterwards fought two battles against Hasdrubal himself with excellent success, killing sisteen thousand of his men, and taking four thousand, with many military enfigns.

^{*} A kind of broom.

XXII. While affairs in Spain were in this state, Publius Scipio, having been, on the expiration of his consulate, continued in command, and sent thither by the fenate, arrived in the province with thirty ships of war, eight thousand soldiers, and a large fupply of provisions. His fleet, which, when feen at a distance, made a grand appearance, by reason of the long train of transport vessels, put into the harbour of Tarraco, caufing great joy among his countrymen and allies. Here Scipio disembarked his troops, and then marched to join his brother; and they thence-

D 2

BOOK thenceforth conducted the war jointly, with perfect XXII harmony of temper, and unanimity in their counfels. Y.R. 535. The Carthaginians were now bufily employed in B.C. 217. making head against the Celtiberians; they therefore without delay passed the Iberus, and not seeing any enemy, proceeded to Saguntum, having received information that the hostages from every part of Spain had been placed there, under custody, by Hannibal, and were guarded in the citadel by a small garrison. This pledge was the only thing which hindered all the states from manifesting their inclinations to an alliance with Rome; as they dreaded lest, in case of their defection, the blood of their children should be made the expiation of their offence. From this restraint, one man, by a device more artful than honourable, fet Spain at liberty. There was at Saguntum a Spaniard of noble birth, called Abelox, who had hitherto behaved with fidelity to the Carthaginians, but had now, out of a disposition very general among barbarians on a change of fortune, altered his attachment. But confidering that a deferter coming to an enemy, without bringing into their hands any advantage of consequence, is no more than an infamous and contemptible individual, he studied how he might procure the most important emolument to his new allies. Wherefore, after reviewing every expedient within the reach of his power to effect, he determined upon a plan of delivering up the hostages into their hands; judging that this alone would prove of all means the most effectual towards conciliating to the Romans the friendship of the Spanish chieftains. But as he well knew that, without an order from Bostar the commander, the guards of the hostages would do thing, he artfully addressed Bostar himself; the latter lying at the time encamped at some distance from the city, on the very shore, with intention to hinder the approach of the Romans from the Here the other, taking him aside to a place

place of secrecy, represented, as if it were un- BOOK known to him, the present state of affairs; that " fear XXII. 46 had hitherto restrained the inclinations of the Spa-Y.R.535. of niards, because the Romans had been at a great B.C. 217. "distance; at present the Roman camp was on their " fide of the Iberus, ferving as a fortrefs and place " of refuge to all who wished a change; wherefore " it was necessary that those who could no longer be 66 bound by fear, should be bound by kindness and " favour." Bostar shewing surprise, and asking what was this unthought-of kindness of such great moment, he answered, "Send home the hostages " to their respective provinces: this will engage the " gratitude of their parents in particular, who are " men of the first consequence in their several states, " and likewise of the communities in general. Every " man wishes to find trust reposed in him, and trust " reposed generally proves a bond of fidelity. The " office of restoring the hostages to their families " I demand for myself that, as I have been the " proposer of the plan, I may likewise be its pro-" moter, by the pains which I shall take in the exe-" cution of it; and may, as far as lies in my power, " render a proceeding, which is acceptable in its " own nature, still more acceptable." gained the approbation of Bostar, who possessed not the same degree of crafty sagacity as other Carthaginians, he went out fecreily by night to the advanced guards of the enemy, where, meeting fome of the Spanish auxiliaries, and being by them conducted to Scipio, he disclosed the business on which he came. Then mutual engagements being entered into, and time and place appointed for delivering up the hostages, he returned to Saguntum. The next day he spent with Bostar, in receiving instructions for the execution of his commission; and, before he left him, fettled the plan so, that he was to go by night, in order to escape the observation of the enemy's watch. At an hour concerted, he called up D 3

BOOK the guards of the boys; and fetting out, he led them. XXII. *as if unknowingly, into the snare prepared by his own treachery. They were then conducted into the Y.R. 535. Roman camp. In every other respect the restoration before we performed as had been settled of the hostages was performed as had been settled with Bostar, and in the same mode of procedure, as if the affair were transacted in the name of the Carthaginians. But, though the act was the same. the Romans acquired a much higher degree of reputation from it than it would have produced to the Carthaginians; because the latter, having shewn themselves oppressive and haughty in prosperity, it might be supposed, that the abatement of their rigour was owing to the change in their fortune, and to their fears; whereas the Roman, on his first arrival, while his character was yet unknown, commenced his administration with an act of clemency and liberality; and it was believed that Abelox would hardly have voluntarily changed fides without fome good reason for such a preceeding. All the states, therefore, with general confent, began to meditate a revolt; and they would have proceeded instantly to hostilities, had they not been prevented by the winter, which obliged even the Romans and Carthaginians to take thelter in houses.

XXIII. These were the occurrences of the second campaign of the Punic war on the side of Spain; while, in Italy, the wise delays of Fabius had afforded the Romans some respite from calamities. However, though his conduct kept Hannibal in a constant state of no little anxiety, (since he perceived that the Romans had at length chosen such a master of the military science, who made war to depend on wisdom, not on fortune,) yet it excited in the sands of his countrymen, both in the camp and in the city, only sentiments of contempt; especially when, during his absence, the master of the horse had been rash enough to hazard a battle, the issue of which rejoicing) was productive of no real advantage. Two incidents occurred which served to increase the Y.R.535. general disapprobation of the dictator's conduct; B.C. 217. one was, an artful contrivance employed by Hannibal to midead the public opinion; for, on the dictator's farm being shewn to him by deserters, he gave orders, that, while every other place in the neighbourhood was levelled to the ground, that alone should be left safe from fire and sword, and every kind of hostile violence; in order that this might be construed as a favour shewn to him, in consideration of some secret compact. The other was an act of his own, respecting the ransoming of the prisoners; the merit of which was, at first, perhaps doubtful, because he had not waited for the direction of the fenate in that case; but, in the end, it evidently redounded to his honour in the highest degree. as had been practifed in the first Punic war, a regulation was established between the Roman and Carthaginian generals, that whichever party should receive a greater number than he returned, should pay for the furplus, at the rate of two pounds and a half of filver * for each foldier. Now the Roman had received a greater number than the Carthaginian, by two hundred and forty-feven; and, though the business was frequently agitated in the senate, yet, because he had not consulted that body on the regulation, the issuing of the money due on this account was too long delayed. Sending, therefore, his fon Quintus to Rome for the purpose, he fold off the farm which had been spared by the enemy, and, at his own private expence, acquitted the public faith. Hannibal lay in an established post under the walls of Geronium, in which city, when he took and burned it, he had left a few houses to serve as granaries. From hence he generally detached two-

which (though it afforded matter for some present BOOK

* 8l. 1s. 5 d.

BC. 217.

BOOK thirds of his army to forage, and the other part he XXII. kept with himself on guard and in readiness for action, providing for the security of the camp, and, at the same time, watching on all sides, lest any attack might be made on the foragers.

> XXIV. The Roman army was, at that time, in the territory of Larinum, and the command was held by Minucius the master of the horse, in consequence, as mentioned before, of the dictator's departure to the city. But the camp, which had been pitched on a high mountain in a secure post, was now brought down to the plains; and more spirited defigns, conformable to the genius of the commander, were meditated: either an attack on the dispersed foragers, or on their camp when left with a flight guard. It did not escape Hannibal's obfervation that the plan of conduct was changed, together with the commander, and that the enemy were likely to act with more boldness than prudence. He fent (which would have been scarcely expected, as the foe was fo near,) a third part of his troops to forage, retaining the other two; and afterwards removed his camp to a hill about two miles from Geronium, and within view of that of the enemy, to shew that he was in readiness to protect his foragers, should any attempt be made on From hence he faw a hill nearer to and overhanging the Roman works, and knowing that, if he went openly in the day to feize on this, the enemy would certainly get before him by a shorter road, he dispatched secretly, in the night, a body of Numidians, who took possession of it: next day, however, the Romans, despising their small number, dislodged them, and removed their own camp this ther. There was now, therefore, but a small space between the ramparts of the two camps, and this the Romans almost entirely filled with their troops in

in order of battle. At the fame time, their cavalry BOOK and light infantry, sent out from the rear against XXII. the foragers, caused great slaughter and conster- Y.R. 535. nation among the scattered troops of the enemy. B.C. 217. Yet Hannibal dared not to hazard a general engagement, for with his small numbers (one third of his army being absent) he was scarcely able to defend his camp, if it were attacked. And now he conducted his measures almost on the plans of Fabius, lying still and avoiding action, while he drew back his troops to his former fituation under the walls of Geronium. According to some writers, they fought a regular pitched battle: in the first encounter the Carthaginian was repulfed, and driven to his camp; from which a fally being fuddenly made, the Romans were worsted in turn, and the fight was afterwards restored by the coming up of Numerius Decimius, a Samnite. This man, the first, with respect both to family and fortune, not only at Bovianum, of which he was a native, but in all Samnium, was conducting to the army, by order of the dictator, a body of eight thousand foot and five hundred horse, which, appearing on Hannibal's rear, was supposed, by both parties, to be a new reinforcement coming from Rome with Fabius. On which Hannibal, dreading likewife fome stratagem, retired within his works. The Romans purfued, and, with the affiftance of the Samnite, took two forts by florm before night. Six thousand of the enemy were flain, and about five thousand of the Romans. Yet though the loiles were fo equal, an account was fent to Rome as of a most important victory, and letters, from the master of the horse, still more oftentations.

XXV. These matters were very often canvassed, both in the fenate and in affembli 3 of the people. The dictator alone, amidst the beneral joy, gave no credit either to the news or the letters; and declared,

Y.R.535. B.C. 217.

BOOK that though all were true, he should yet apprehend more evil from success than from disappointment; whereupon Marcus Metilius, a plebeian tribune, infifted, that "fuch behaviour was not to be en-" dured; the dictator, not only when present with " the army, obstructed its acting with success, but " also, at this distance, when it had performed good " fervice, impeded the good confequences likely to " enfue; protracting the war, in order that he " might continue the longer in office, and hold the " fole command both at Rome and in the army. "One of the confuls had fallen in the field, and "the other, under pretext of pursuing a Cartha-" ginian fleet, had been fent away far from Italy: "the two prætors were employed in Sicily and Sar-" dinia, neither of which provinces had, at that "time, any occasion for the presence of a prætor. " Marcus Minucius, the master of the horse, was "kept, as it were, in cultody, lest he should come " within fight of the enemy, or perform any military " fervice. So that, in fact, not only Samnium, the " possession of which had been yield up to the " Carthaginans, as well as that of the country " beyond the Iberus, but also the Campanian, Cale-" nian, and Falernian territories had been ravaged " and destroyed; while the dictator " inactive at Cafilinum, and, with the Roman le-" gions, protected his own estate. The army and "the mafter of the horse, who were eager to fight, " had been kept, in a manner, shut up within "the trenches, and deprived of arms, like cap-"tured forces: but when, at last, the dictator left " them, when they were freed from their confine-"ment, they passed the trenches, defeated the enemy, and put him to slight. For all which " reasons, if the Roman commons were possessed " of their ancient spirit, he would have boldly pro-" posed to depose Quintus Fabius from his office: as matters stood at the present, however, he " would

"would offer a moderate proposition, that the master BOO.K " of the horse should be invested with authority XXII. " equal to that of the dictator; and still, when that Y.R.535. " should be done, that Quintus Fabius should not B.C. 217. " be fent to the army, until he should first substi-"tute a conful in the room of Caius Flaminius." The dictator shunned the assemblies, knowing the people's prejudices against any thing he could say; nor even in the fenate was he very favourably heard, particularly when he spoke in high terms of the enemy, and imputed to the rashness and unskilfulness of the commanders the disasters of the two preceding years, and declared, that "the master of "horse should be called to account for having " fought contrary to his orders. If the entire com-" mand and direction were in him, he would foon " give people reason to be convinced, that to a " good commander fortune is a matter of flight " confideration; and that wisdom and prudence " control and govern all things. For his part, he " deemed it more glorious to have faved the army " at a critical juncture, and without fuffering dif-grace, than to have flain many thousands of the " enemy."

XXVI. Having frequently discoursed in this manner without effect, and having created Marcus Atilius Regulus consul, the dictator, unwilling to be present at a contest concerning the authority of his office, set out, during the night preceding the day on which the affair of the proposition was to be decided, and went to the army. As soon as day arose, the commons met in assembly, their minds filled with tacit displeasure against the dictator, and savour towards the master of the horse; yet were not people very forward to stand forth in praise of the measure, however generally agreeable; so that while the proposition had an abundant majority, still

BOOK it wanted support. The only person found to second XXII. it was Caius Terentius Varro, who had been prætor the year before; a man not only of humble, but of Y.R. 535. the year before; a man not only of humble, but of B.C. 217. fordid birth. We are told that his father was a butcher, who attended in person the sale of his meat, and that he employed this very fon in the fervile offices of that trade. This young man having, by the money thus acquired and left to him by his father, conceived hopes of attaining a more respectable fituation in life, turned his thoughts to the bar and the Forum, where, by the vehemence of his harangues in favour of men and causes of the basest fort, in opposition to the worthy citizens of fortune and character, he at first attracted the notice of the people, and afterwards obtained honourable employments. Having passed through the quætorship, two ædileships, the plebeian and curule, and lastly, the prætorship, he now raised his views to the confulship; and artfully contriving to make the general displeasure against the dictator the means of procuring popularity to himself, he alone gained the whole credit of the order paffed by the commons. Excepting the dictator himself, all men, whether his friends or foes, in the city or in the camp, confidered that order as passed with the intention of affronting him. But he, with the same steadiness of mind which he had displayed in bearing the charges made against him by his enemies before the multitude, bore likewise this ill-treatment thrown on him by the people in the violence of passion; and though he received on his journey, a letter containing a decree of the fenate, giving equal authority to the master of the horse; yet, being fully confident that, together with the authority in comn and, the skill of the commanders had not been made equal, he proceeded to the army, with a spirit unsubdued either by his countrymen or the enemy.

XXVII. But Minucius, whose arrogance was BOOK scarcely tolerable before, on this flow of success and of favour with the populace, threw off all restraints of modesty and moderation, and openly boasted no B.C. 217. less of his victory over Quintus Fabius than of that over Hannibal: "He was the only com-" mander," he faid, " who, in the desperate situa-" tion of their affairs, had been found a match for "Hannibal; and he was now, by order of the " people. fet on a level with Fabius. A fuperior " magistrate, with an inferior; a dictator, with the " mafter of the horse; of which, no instance was to " be found in the records of history; and this in " a state where the masters of the hors; used to "dread and tremble at the rods and axes of dic-46 tators; with fuch a high degree of lustre had his 66 good fortune and successful bravery shone forth. "He was resolved, therefore, to pursue his own " good fortune, should his colleague persist in "dilatory and flothful plans, condemned by the " judgment both of gods and men." Accordingly, on the first day of his meeting Fabius, he told him, that "they ought, in the first place, to determine in "what manner they should exercise the command, " with which they were now equally invested; that, " in his judgment, the best method would be, that " each should hold the supreme authority and com-" mand alternately, either for a day, or for fome " longer fixed portion of time, if that were more agreeable; to the end, that if he should meet any 46 favourable opportunity of acting, he might be a "match for the enemy, not only in conduct, but " likewife in strength." This Quintus Fabius by no means approved; for "fortune," he said, "would " have the disposal of every thing which should be " under the direction of his colleague's rashness. "The command had been shared between them, of not taken away from him: he would never, there-" fore, voluntarily divest himself of the power of " keeping

KEPING fuch part of the business as he could, WXII. "under the guidance of prudence. He would not divide times, or days of command, with him; but he would divide the troops, and, by his own counsels, would preserve as much as he could, fince he was not allowed to preserve the whole." He accordingly prevailed to have the legions divided between them, as was the practice with consuls. The first and fourth fell to Minucius, the second and third to Fabius. They likewise divided, in equal numbers, the cavalry, and the allied and Latine auxiliaries. The master of the horse chose also that they should encamp separately.

XXVIII. Hannibal was not ignorant of any thing that passed among the enemy; for, besides the intelligence procured through his spies, he derived ample information from deferters. In these proceedings he found a twofold cause of rejoicing; for the temerity of Minucius, now free from control, he could entrap at his will; and the wisdom of Fabius was reduced to act with but half his former strength. Between the camp of Minucius, and that of the Carthaginians, stood a hill, of which, whoever took possession, would evidently render' the other's fituation more inconvenient. This Hannibal wished to seize; but he was not so desirous of gaining it without a dispute, (even though it were worth his while,) as of bringing on, thereby, an engagement with Minucius; who, he well knew, would be always ready to meet him in order to thwart his defigns. The whole intervening ground feemed, at first view, incapable of admitting any stratagem, having on it no kind of wood, nor being even covered with brambles; but, in reality, it was by nature formed most commodiously for an ambush, especially as, in a naked vale, no snare of that fort could be apprehended; and there were, fides, at the skirts of it, hollow rocks, several of which

which were capable of containing two hundred BOOK armed men. In these concealments were lodged XXII. five thousand horse and foot, distributed in such Y.R.355. numbers as could find convenient room in each B.C. 217. place. Nevertheless, lest the motion of any of them, coming out inconfiderately, or the glittering of their arms, might betray the stratagem in such an open valley, he diverted the enemy's attention to another quarter, by fending, at the first dawn, a fmall detachment to feize on the hill above-men-Immediately on the appearance of these, the Romans, despising the smallness of their numbers. demanded, each for himself, the task of dislodging them, and fecuring the hill; while the general himfelf, among the most foolish and presumptuous, called to arms, and with vain parade and empty menaces expressed his contempt of the enemy. First, he sent out his light infantry; then, the cavalry, in close order; at last, seeing reinforcements fent by the Carthaginian, he advanced with the legions in order of battle. On the other fide, Hannibal, by fending up, as the contest grew hotter, feveral bodies of troops, one after another, to the fupport of his men when diffressed, had now almost completed a regular line; and the contest was maintained with the whole force of both parties. The Roman light infantry in the van, marching up from the lower ground to the hill already occupied by the enemy, were repulfed; and, being forced to retreat, carried terror among the cavalry, who were advancing in their rear, and fled back to the front of the legions. The line of infantry alone remained undifmayed, amidst the general panic of the rest; and there was reason to think, that in a fair and regular battle they would have proved themselves not inferior to their antagonists, so great spirits had they assumed from their late success. But the troops in ambush rising on a sudden, and making brisk attacks both on their flanks and their rear, caused such dread

BOOK dread and confusion, that no one retained either XXII. comage to fight, or hope of escape.

Y.R.535. B.C.217.

XXIX. Fabius, who had first heard their cries of difmay, and afterwards faw, at a distance, their line in disorder, then said, "It is so; fortune has " found out rashness, but not sooner than I feared. "He, who was made in command equal to Fabius, " fees Hannibal his superior both in bravery and " fuccess. But there will be time enough for re-" proof and refentment; march now out of your "trenches. Let us extort the victory from the " enemy, and from our countrymen, an acknow-" ledgment of their error." When a great number were now flain, and others looking about for a way to escape, on a sudden Fabius's army shewed itself, as if sent down from heaven to their relief, and, by its appearance, before the troops came within a weapon's throw, or struck a stroke, put a stop both to the precipitate flight of their friends, and the extravagant fury of the enemy. Those who had broken their ranks, and dispersed themselves different ways, flocked together, from all fides, to the fresh army; such as had fled in great numbers together, faced about, and forming in lines, now retreated leifurely; then, feveral bodies uniting, stood on their defence. And now the two armies, the vanquished and the fresh, had almost formed one front, and were advancing against the foe, when the Carthaginians founded a retreat; Hannibal openly acknowledging, that as he had defeated Minucius, fo he had been himfelf deseated by Fabius. The greatest part of the day being spent in these various changes of fortune, when the troops returned into their camps, Minucius calling his men together, said, "Soldiers, I have often heard, that " he is the first man, in point of abilities, who, of " himself, forms good counsels; that the next, is " he, who fubmits to good advice; and that he

" who neither can himself form good counsels, nor BOOK "knows how to comply with those of another, is X " of the very lowest capacity. Now, fince our lot Y.k.53; " has denied us the first rank in genius and c pacity, B.C. 217. " let us maintain the fecond, the middle one; and, " until we learn to command, be fatisfied to be " ruled by the skilful. Let us join camps with "Fabius; and, when we shall have carried our " standards to his quarters; when I shall have " faluted him by the title of Father; for nothing " less has his kindness towards us, as well as his " high dignity deserved; then, soldiers, ye will " falute, as your patrons, those men, whose arms " and whose prowess have just now protected you; " and then this day will have procured for us, if " nothing else, at least the honour of possessing " grateful minds."

XXX. The fignal was displayed, and notice given to get ready to march. They then fet out; and, as they proceeded in a body to the camp of the dictator, they threw him, and all around, into great furprize. When they had planted their standards before his tribunal, the matter of the horse, advancing before the reft, faluted him by the title of Father; and the whole body of his men, with one voice, faluted those who stood round as their Minucius then expressed himself thus: patrons. "Dictator, to my parents, to whom I have just " now compared you, in the most respectful appel-" lation by which I could address myself, I am in-" debted for life only; to you, both for my own " preservation, and that of all these present. " order of the people, therefore, by which I have " been oppressed rather than honoured, I am the " first to cancel and annul; and, so may it be " happy to you, to me, and to these your armies, " the preferved and the preferver, I replace my-" felf and them, these standards, and these legions, BOOK " under your command and auspices; and entreat

" you, that, re-admitting us to your favour, you will order me to hold the post of master of the Y.R.535. "horse, and these their several ranks." On this they cordially embraced; and, on the meeting being dismissed, the soldiers accompanying Minucius were hospitably and kindly invited to refreshment, both by their acquaintances and those to whom they were unknown. Thus was converted into a day of rejoicing, from a day of forrow, one which but a little before had nearly proved fatal. When an account of these events arrived at Rome, and was afterwards confirmed by letters, not only from the generals themselves, but from great numbers of the soldiers, in both the armies, all men warmly praifed Maximus, and extolled him to the sky. Nor were the sentiments felt by the Carthaginians, his enemies, and by Hannibal, less honourable to him. They then at length perceived, that they were waging war against Romans and in Italy. For during the two preceding years, they had entertained fuch contemptuous notions, both of the Roman generals and foldiers, as scarcely to believe that they were fighting against the same nation, of which they had received from their fathers fuch a terrible character. We are told likewise, that Hannibal, as he returned from the field, observed, that "the cloud which hung over the moun-"tains, had at last discharged its rain in a storm."

> XXXI. During the course of these transactions in Italy, Cneius Servilius Geminus, conful, with a fleet of one hundred and twenty ships, sailed round the coasts of Sardinia and Corsica. Having received hostages in both places, he steered his course towards Africa, and, before he made any descent on the continent, ravaged the island of Meninx, and received from the inhabitants of Cercina ten talents of filver * as a contribution, to prevent the like devastation and burning of their country: he then BOOK drew near the coast of Africa, and disembarked his XXII. forces. Here the foldiers and mariners were led out Y.R. 535. to ravage the country, in as careless a manner as if B.C. 217. they were plundering the islands where there were very few inhabitants; in confequence of which rashness, they fell unawares into a snare. Being assailed on all fides, and while they were in loofe diforder, by compact bodies of men acquainted with the country of which themselves were utterly ignorant, they were driven back to their ships in a disgraceful flight, and with severe loss. There fell no less than a thousand men, among whom was Sempronius Blæsus, the quæstor. The fleet, hastily setting sail from the shore which was covered with the enemy, paffed over to Sicily, and at Lilybæum was delivered to the prætor Titus Otacilius, to be conducted home to Rome, by his lieutenant-general Publius Sura. The conful himself, travelling by land through Sicily, croffed the streight into Italy, having been fummoned, as was likewife his colleague, Marcus Atilius, by a letter from Quintus Fabius, in order that they might receive the command of the army from him, as the fix months, the term of his office, were nearly expired. Almost all the historians affirm, that Fabius acted against Hannibal in the capacity of dictator. Coelius even remarks, that he was the first dictator created by the people. But it escaped the notice of Coelius and the rest, that the privilege of nominating that officer belonged folely to Cneius Servilius, the only conful in being, who was at the time, far distant from home, in the province of Gaul; and so much time must necessarily elapse before it could be done by him, that the state, terrified by the late disafter, could not endure the delay, and therefore had recourse to the expedient of creating, by a vote of the people, a prodictator; and that the fervices which he afterwards performed, his diffinguished renown as a commander, and the BOOK exaggerations of his descendants, in the inscription XXII. of his statue, may easily account for his being called dictator instead of prodictator. Y.R.535. B.C. 217.

XXXII. The confuls, having taken the command of the armies, Marcus Atilius of that of Fabius, and Geminus Servilius of that of Minucius, and having erected huts for the winter, as the feafon required (for it was now near the close of autumn), conducted their operations conformably to the plan of Fabius, and with the utmost harmony between themselves. Whenever Hannibal went out to forage, they came upon him in different places, as opportunity ferved, haraffing him on his march, and cutting off stragglers; but never hazarded a general engagement, which the enemy endeavoured to bring on by every means he could contrive: fo that Hannibal was reduced, by scarcity, to such distress, that had he not feared that a retreat would have carried the appearance of flight, he would have returned back into Gaul; not having the least hope of supporting his army in those places, if the succeeding consuls should adopt the same plan of operations with these. While, in the neighbourhood of Geronium, hostilities were fuspended by the coming on of winter, ambassadors came to Rome from Neapolis, who brought into the fenate-house forty golden bowls of great weight, and spoke to this effect: "They knew "that the treasury of the Roman people was ex-44 hausted by the present war, which was carried on " no less in defence of the cities and lands of the " allies, than the empire and city of Rome, the me-" tropolis and bulwark of Italy; that the Neapolitans " had therefore thought it reasonable, that whatever " gold had been left to them by their ancestors for "the decoration of their temples, or support in time " of need, should now be applied to the aid of the "Roman people. That if they had thought their per-66 fonal fervice of any use, they would with the same " zeal

12

" zeal have offered it. That the Roman senate BOOK and people would act in a manner highly grateful XXII. " to them, if they would reckon every thing in Y.R 535. " possession of the Neapolitans as their own, and B.C. 217. " vouchfafe to accept from them a present, of which " the principal value and importance confided in "the disposition and wishes of those who chearfully " offered it rather than in its own intrinsic worth." Thanks were given to the ambaffadors for their attention and generosity, and one bowl, which was the least in weight, was accepted.

XXXIII. About the same time a Carthaginian fpy, who had lurked undiscovered for two years, was detected at Rome: his hands were cut off, and he was fent away. Twenty-five flaves, for having formed a conspiracy in the field of Mars, were crucified, and the informer was rewarded with his freedom, and twenty thousand affes in weight . Ambassadors were sent to Philip King of Macedonia, to infift on his delivering up Demetrius of Pharia, who, being defeated in war, had fled to him; others also were sent, at the same time, to the Ligurians, to expostulate on their having assisted the Carthaginian with men and fupplies, and to observe what was doing in the neighbourhood among the Boians and Insubrians. Delegates were also fent to Illyrium, to Pineus the King, to demand the tribute, of which the day of payment had elapsed; or to receive hostages, if he wished to be allowed longer time. Thus the Romans, though prefled at home by a war immensely grievous, yet relaxed not their attention to the business of the state in any part of ^{} Eris gravis, 641. Its. 8d. About this time, in confequence of the icarcity of money, the comparative value of brafs to filver was changed, and a denarius made to pass for twelve and afterwards for fixteen affes. The words es grave were thenceforward employed to figurify not any particular piece, or weight, of money, but the old comparative standard of ten asses, as we say pounds sterling.

Y R 5 25.

BOOK the world, however distant. Their care was also excited by a matter of religious concernment. temple of Concord, vowed two years before by the B.C. 217. prætor Lucius Manlius, on occasion of the mutiny of the foldiers in Gaul not having been yet fet about, Marcus Æmilius, prætor of the city, constituted dumnvirs for that purpose, Cneius Pupius and Cæso Quintius Flamininus, who contracted for the building of it in the citadel. By the same prætor, in pursuance of a decree of the senate, a letter was fent to the confuls, that if they thought proper, one of them should come to Rome to elect successors, and that a proclamation should be issued for holding the election, on whatever day they might name. answer to this the consuls wrote back, that, "with-" out detriment to the business of the public, they " could not go to any distance from the enemy. "That it would be better, therefore, that the elec-"tion should be held by an interrex, than that " either of them should be called away from the " war." The fenate judged it more advisable that a dictator should be nominated by a conful, for the purpose of holding the election, and Lucius Veturius Philo being accordingly nominated, appointed Manius Pomponius Matho mafter of the horfe. But fome defect being discovered in their appointment, they were ordered, on the fourteenth day, to abdicate their offices, and an interregnum took place.

XXXIV. The confuls were continued in com-Y.R.536. B.C. 216. mand for another year. The patricians declared interrex Caius Claudius Centho, fon of Appius, and afterwards Publius Cornelius Afina, under whose direction the election was held; which was attended with a warm contention between the patricians and The populace struggled hard to raise to the confulship, Caius Terentius Varro, a person of their own rank, who, as before observed, by railing against the patricians, and by other popular arts, had had acquired their affection; and who, by under- BOOK mining the interest of Fabius and the dictatorial XXII. authority, had made the public displeasure against Y.R. 536. him the means of adding a lustre to his own charac- B.C.216. ter. The patricians opposed him with their utmost efforts, lest a power should be given to those men of raifing themselves to the level of nobles, by means of malignant afperfions on their characters. Quintus Bæbius Herennius, a plebeian tribune, a relation of Caius Terentius, cenfured not only the fenate, but likewife the augurs, for having hindered the dictator from holding the election, and thought, by rendering them odious, to increase the popularity of his favourite candidate. He afferted, that, "by cer-" rain of the nobility, who, for many years, had " been wishing for a war, Hannibal was induced " to enter Italy; that by the same men the war was " treacherously prolonged, though it might have " been brought to a conclusion; further, that an " army, confilling of four entire legions, was fuffi-" ciently able to cope with the enemy, was evident " from this, that Marcus Minucius, in the absence " of Fabius, had fought with fuccess. That two " legions had been exposed in the field, with intent "that they should be defeated, and then were " rescued from the brink of destruction in order 66 that the man should be faluted as father and " patron, who had hinden ' he Romans from con-" quering, though he !. 'terwards prevented "their defeat. That the comuls had, on the plan " of Fabius, protracted the war, when they had it " in their power to bring it to an end. " confederacy to this purpose had been entered into " by all the nobles, nor would the people know " peace, until they elected to the confulship a real plebeian, a new man: for as to the plebeians, " who had attained nobility, they were now initiated " into the mysteries of their order; and, from the " moment when they ceafed to be despised by the of patricians, E 4

BOOK " patricians, looked with contempt on the com-"mons. Who did not fee, that the end and intention of appointing an interregnum was to Y.R.536. " put the election into the power of the patricians? "It was with a view to this that both the confuls 66 had remained with the army; with the same " view afterwards, when, contrary to their wishes, a dictator had been nominated to hold the elec-" tion, they arbitrarily carried the point, that the 266 appointment should be pronounced defective by " the augurs. They had in their hands, therefore. " the office of interrex; but certainly one conful's " place was the right of the Roman commons, "which the people would dispose of with impar-" tiality, and would bestow on such a person as " rather wished to conquer effectually, than to " continue long in command."

> XXXV. These inflammatory speeches had such an effect on the commons, that though there stood candidates three patricians, Publius Cornelius Merenda, Lucius Manlius Volfo, and Marcus Æmilius Lepidus, and two of plebeian extraction, whose families were now ennobled, Caius Atilius Serranus, and Quintus Ælius Pætus, one of whom was pontiff, the other augur; yet Caius Terentius Varro, alone, was elected conful, in order that he might have the direction of the affembly for choosing his colleague. On which the nobles, having found that his competitors possessed not sufficient strength, prevailed, by violent importunity, on a new can-didate to stand forth, after he had long and earnestly refused; this was Lucius Æmilius Paullus, a determined enemy of the commons, who had been conful before with Marcus Livius, and had very narrowly escaped being sentenced to punishment, as was his colleague. On the next day of affembly all those who had opposed Varro, having declined the contest, he was appointed rather as an antagonist antagonist than as a colleague. The election of BOOK prætors * was then held, and Manius Pomponius XXII. Matho, and Publius Furius Philus were chosen. Y.R. 536. The lot of administering justice to the citizens of B.C. 216. Rome fell to Pomponius, that of deciding causes between Roman citizens and foreigners, to Publius Furius Philus. Two additional prætors were appointed, Marcus Claudius Marcellus for Sicily, Lucius Postumius Albinus for Gaul. All thefe were appointed in their absence; nor, excepting the conful Terentius was any of them invelted with an office which he had not administered before: several men of bravery and activity being passed by, because, at such a juncture, it was not judged expedient to intrust any person with a new employment.

XXXVI. Augmentations were also made to the armies; but as to the number of additional forces of foot and horse which were raised, writers vary fo much, as well as in the kind of troops, that I can scarcely venture to affirm any thing certain on that head. Some authors affert, that ten thousand new foldiers were levied; others four new legions; fo that there were eight legions employed: and that

* At first the name of prætor, derived from præire, to preside, was applied to any magistrate who was the chief in any line, whether civil, military, or religious; as dictator, conful, commander of an army, &c. But it was afterwards appropriated to a magistrate, appointed to relieve the confuls from the burthen of superintending the administration of justice. His proper office, therefore, was the direction of judicial proceedings; but, in the absence of the consuls, he acted in their stead, with power nearly equal to theirs. The great influx of foreigners foon made it necessary to create a second prætor, who was called prator peregrinus, the foreign prætor, because his business was to decide controversies between citizens and foreigners, while the city prætor, prator urbanus, who was superior in dignity, took cognizance of fuits between citizens. When the Romans gained possesfion of foreign provinces, they appointed a prætor to the government of each, and his power within his province was almost unlimited, for he was accountable to none but the people of Rome.

BOOK the legions were also augmented, both horse and XXII. foot; one thousand foot and one hundred horse being Y.R. 536. added to each, so as to make it contain five thousand B.C. 216. soot, and four hundred horse; and that the allies furnished an equal number of foot, and double the number of horse. Some writers affirm, that, at the time of the battle at Cannæ, there were in the Roman camp eighty-feven thousand two hundred foldiers. All agree in this, that greater force, and more vigorous efforts, were now employed than in the former years, in consequence of the dictator having afforded them room to hope that the enemy might be vanquished. However, before the new legions began their march from the city, the decemvirs were ordered to go and inspect the books, because people in general were terrified by prodigies of extraordinary kinds: for accounts were received, that, at Rome, on the Aventine, and, at the same time, at Aricia, a shower of stones had fallen; that, in the country of the Sabines, statues had sweated abundance of blood, and that the warm waters at Cære had flowed bloody from the fpring; and this circumstance, having happened frequently, excited therefore the greater terror. In a street, near the field of Mars, several persons had been struck with lightning, and killed. These portents were expiated according to the directions of the books. Ambaffadors from Pæstum brought some golden vessels to Rome, and to these, as to the Neapolitans, thanks were returned, but the gold was not accepted.

> XXXVII. About the same time arrived at Ostia a fleet, fent by Hiero, with a large supply of provisions. The Syracusan ambassadors, being introduced to the fenate, acquainted them, that "King " Hiero had been as fincerely afflicted, of mearing " of the loss of the conful Caius Flaminius, and his " army, as he could have been by any difafter hap-" pening to himself, or his own kingdom. Where-" fore.

" fore, though he was fully sensible that the grandeur BOOK " of the Roman people had thone forth, in times of " adversity, with a still more admirable degree of Y.R. 536 "hustre than even in prosperity, yet he had sent B.C. 216. " fuch supplies of every fort, for the support of "the war, as are usually furnished by good and faith-" ful allies; and he earnestly belought the Conscript "Fathers not to refuse them. That, in the first  place, for the fake of the omen, they had brought " a golden statue of Victory, of three hundred and 46 twenty pounds weight, which they prayed them " to accept, hold, and possess, as appropriated to " them for ever. That they had likewife, in order 66 to guard against any want of provisions, brought "three hundred thousand pecks of wheat, and two "hundred thousand of barley; and that whatever " further supplies might be necessary, should be con-" veyed to fuch places as the fenate should order. "That he knew that the Roman people employed 66 not in the main body of their army, or in the 66 cavalry, any other than Roman citizens, or Latine " confederates; yet as he had feen, in a Roman " camp, foreign bands of light-armed auxiliaries, he " had therefore fent a thousand archers and slingers, " a body well qualified to oppose the Balearians, "Moors, and other nations remarkable for fighting " with missile weapons." To these presents he added likewise advice: that "the prætor, to whose " lot the province of Sicily might fall, should cross " over with a fleet to Africa, in order to give the " enemy employment for their arms in their own " country, and to allow them the less leifure to " fupply Hannibal with reinforcements." The fenate returned an answer to the King in these terms " " Fliero had ever acted as a man of horizon and an excellent ally; that from the "time, when he first united in friendship with the "Roman people, he had, through the whole course " of his conduct, manifested an invariable fidelity

BOOK "in his attachment to them; and in all times, and " in all places, had, with great liberality, supported the interest of Rome. Of this the Roman. Y.R. 536. "people entertained, as they ought, a grateful fense. "That gold had likewife been offered by some other " flates, which, though thankful for the intention, "the Roman people had not accepted: the statue " of Victory, however, and the omen, they accepted, " and had offered, and dedicated to that divinity, a " mansion in the Capitol, in the temple of Jupiter "fupremely good and great; hoping that, con-" fecrated in that fortress of the city of Rome, she "would be pleafed to remain firm and immoveable. " kind and propitious to the Roman people." The flingers, archers, and the corn were delivered to the To the fleet of ships, already in Sicily confuls. with the prætor Titus Otacilius, were added twentyfive quinqueremes, and he received permission, if he judged it conducive to the public good, to pass over to Africa.

> XXXVIII. After the levies were completed, the confuls waited a few days for the arrival of the confederates from Latium. At this time the foldiers were obliged to take an oath dictated by the tribunes, which had never before been practifed. For, until now, there had been no public oath taken, only that they would affemble on the orders of the confuls, and, without their orders, would not depart; and then, when they joined their decury or century, the horsemen, on being placed in their decuries, and the footmen on being placed in their centuries, used to swear voluntarily, among themfelves, that they would not depart through fear or in flight; nor quit their ranks, except for the purpose of taking up or bringing a weapon, whiking an enemy, or faving a countryman. This, from having been a voluntary compact between themselves, was now put under the jurisdiction of the tribunes.

bunes, who were invefted with legal authority to BOOK administer this oath. Before the troops began their XXII. march from the city, the harangues of the conful Y.R.536. Varro were frequent, and full of prefumption; in B.C.216. these he openly afferted, that the war had been purposely drawn into Italy by the nobles, and would continue fixed in the very center of the commonwealth, if men like Fabius were to have the command; but that he, on the very first day, wherein he should get fight of the enemy, would bring it to a conclusion. The only speech made by his colleague Paullus, on the day before that on which they set out from the city, contained more truth than flattery, addressed to the people; nevertheless he used no harsh expressions against Varro, excepting thus much; that "it was a matter of furprise " to him, how any man, before he was acquainted " with either his own or the enemy's forces, the " fituation of posts, or the nature of the country, " while he remained in the city, in short, and in "the garb of peace, could yet know what he " fhould have to do when he came to take the " field; and could even foretell the day on which " he was to come to a general engagement. For "his part, as men's plans must be regulated by cir-" cumstances, and not circumstances by their plans, " he would not be in hafte to adopt prematurely "any one, before the feafon shewed its expe-"diency. He wished that even those measures, 66 which had been taken under the guidance of " caution and prudence, might be attended with 66 prosperous issue; since rashness, besides the folly "which it involved, had been hitherto constantly " unfuccessful." Without any farther declaration, it was hence apparent, that he preferred fafe to hasty variels; and, to induce him to adhere the more firmly to this resolution, Quintus Fabius Maximus is faid to have addressed him, just before his departure, in this manner: -

BOOK XXII. Y.R.536. B.C.216.

XXXIX. " If, Lucius Æmilius, you had a col-" league like yourfelf, (which I earnestly wish,) " or, if yourfelf were like your colleague, any address from me would be supersuous; because, in the first place, two good confuls would, without " advice from me, out of their own honourable zeal, " act, in every particular, to the advantage of the public; and, in the other, two bad ones would " neither admit my words into their cars, nor my " counsels into their breasts. At present, when I " confider, on the one hand, your colleague, and, " on the other, yourself and your character, I ad-" drefs myfelf folely to you, whose endeavours, as " a worthy man and citizen, I perceive will be "without effect, if the administration be defective " on the other fide. Evil counfels will have equal " privilege and authority with good. For, Lucius "Paullus, you are much mistaken if you suppose " that you will have a less difficult struggle to main-" tain with Caius Terentius than with Hannibal. " I know not whether the former may not prove " more dangerous than the latter. With the one. " you will contend in the field only; with the " other, in all places and times; against Hannibal " and his legions, you will be supported in fight, " by your troops of infantry and cavalry; Varro " will oppose you at the head of your own foldiers. " May the mention of Caius Flaminius not prove " ominous to you! But he became mad, after " he became conful, when in his province, and at "the head of the army: in a word, this man, " before he professed himself a candidate for the " confulship, afterwards, while he canvassed for " it, and now, fince his appointment, before he " has feen the camp or the enemy, has pro-" ceeded, all along, in one continued paroxism of "infanity. And when, by raving of fights and fields of battle, he now excites fuch storms among " the peaceful citizens in their gowns, what do you " fuppose he will do among the young men, who BOOK " have arms in their hands, and with whom acts "instantly follow words? If he shall immediately " fight the enemy, as he boasts that he will, either B.C. 216. * am ignorant of military affairs, of the nature of "the present war, and of the enemy with whom we " have to deal, or some other place will be rendered " fill more remarkable by our difasters, than was " the Trasimenus. It is no time for me to boast, " talking as I am to a fingle man; and if I have " gone too far on either fide, it was in contemning, " not in feeking applause: but the truth is this; " the only rational method of conducting the war " against Hannibal, is that in which I conducted it; " nor does the event alone confirm this, (for fools " only judge by events,) but the reasons which " did and must subsist, as long as circumstances " shall remain the fame and unchangeable. 46 are carrying on war in Italy, in our own country, " and on our own foil, where all the places round " are full of our countrymen and allies, who do, " and will affift us with men, arms, horses, and "provisions. That we may so far rely on their " faithful attachment, they have given fufficient " preofs in the times of our distress. Time will " daily improve us, will render us more prudent, " more steady. Hannibal, on the contrary, is in a " foreign, an hostile territory, furrounded on all " fides by enemies and dangers, far from home, " far from his native country; both land and fea " are possessed by his foes; no cities receive " him within their walls; he nowhere fees aught "which he can call his own; he lives on the " plunder of the day; he has scarcely a third part " of that army which he brought over the river " Iberus; nor has he a supply of food for the few "who remain. "Do you doubt then, that by avoid-" ing action we shall overcome him, whose strength

BOOK " is of itself declining every day, who has no Y.R. 536. "money? How long under the walls of Gero-B.C. 216. "nium, a wretched fort of Apulia, as if under " those of Carthage, did I - But I will not vaunt " even before you. See how the last confuls, "Cneius Servilius and Marcus Atilius, baffled him. "Believe me, Lucius Paullus, this is the only way " of fafety; yet this will be thwarted by your "countrymen, rather than by the enemy. For "the fame thing will be defired by both parties; "the wish of Varro, the Roman conful, will be "the fame with that of Hannibal, the Carthagi-" nian. You alone will have two generals to with-" ftand. However you will withstand them, pro-" vided you maintain a proper degree of firmness; " fo as not to be shaken by common fame, or "by the rumours which will be fpread among " the people; by neither the empty applause be-" stowed on your colleague, nor the falle imputa-"tions thrown on yourfelf. It is commonly faid " that truth is often eclipfed, but never extinguished. "He who slights fame, shall enjoy it in its purity. " Let them call you timid, instead of cautious; "dilatory instead of considerate; an unenterprising " instead of a consummate commander. I rather " wish that a wife enemy may fear, than that " the foolish part of your own countrymen should "applaud you. Attempting every thing, you will " be despised by Hannibal; doing nothing rashly, " you will be feared by him. Yet I by no means " recommend that nothing should be done, but that in all your proceedings you be guided by " reason, not by fortune; that you keep every " matter always within your own power, and " under your own direction; that you be always " armed and on your guard; and that you neither fail to improve a favourable opportunity, ee nor nor afford such an opportunity to the foe. Act- BOOK " ing with deliberation, you will fee every thing XXII. " clearly and distinctly; haste is improvident and " blind."

Y.R.535. B.C. 216.

XI. The conful answered rather in a desponding ftyle: he acknowledged the truth of what had been faid, but shewed little hope of being able to put the advice into execution. " If Fabius," he faid, " when dictator, had been unable to withstand the arrogance of his master of the horse, what power or influence could a conful have, to oppose a se-"ditious and hot-headed colleague? As to himself, " he had, in his former consulate, escaped the flames of popular rage, not without being scorched. He " wished that all might end happily: but should any " misfortune occur, he would expose his life to the " weapons of the enemy, rather than to the votes " of his incenfed countrymen." Immediately after this conversation, as we are told, Paullus set out, escorted by the principal patricians, while the plebeians attended their own conful in a crowd more numerous than respectable. When they came into the field, and the old and new troops were intermixed, they formed two feparate camps; the new one, which was likewife the smaller, was nearer to Hannibal; the old one contained the greater number, and the main strength of the army. Then Marcus Atilius, one of the confuls of the former year, wishing to be difmissed, on account of the state of his health, was fent to Rome; and the other, Geminus Servillas, was charged with the command of a Roman legion, and two thousand of the confederate infantry and cavalry, stationed in the smaller camp. Hannibal, though he saw the force of the enemy doubled, yet rejoiced exceedingly at the arrival of the confus. For besides that he had no part remaining of the provisions acquired by plunder from day to day, there was nothing now left within his reach.

BOOK reach, of which he could make prey: all the corn in every quarter, when it was found unfafe to keep Y.R. 536. into the fortified towns; fo that, as was afterwards discovered, he had scarcely a quantity sufficient for ten days; and, in consequence of the scarcity, a defign had been formed, among the Spaniards, of going over to the enemy, had time been allowed them to bring it to maturity.

> XLI. But fortune herself concurred in adminiftering fuel to the impatient temper and rashness of the conful; for, an attack having been made on their plundering parties, and a tumultuary kind of engagement enfuing, occasioned rather by the voluntary exertions of the foldiers running up to the fpot, than by any preconcerted defign, or order, of the commanders, the Carthaginians were confiderably worsted, losing a thousand seven hundred men, while there fell, of the Romans and their confederates, not more than an hundred. However, while the victors purfued with eagerness, the conful Paullus, who held the command on that day, (for they commanded alternately,) dreading an ambuscade, obliged them to halt, though Varro expressed great indignation at it, exclaiming, that the enemy had been allowed to slip out of their hands; and that the war might have been finished, had not a stop been put to the Hannibal grieved not much for this loss: on the contrary, he rather believed that it would ferve as a bait to enfnare the more prefumptuous conful, and the foldiers, particularly the raw ones. All the circumstances of the enemy were as well known to him as his own; that the commanders were of diffimilar characters, and difunited in opinion; and that almost two-thirds of their army were raw recruits. Thinking, therefore, that he had now found both time and place convenient for a stratagem, on the following night, he led away his men, with with no other incumbrance than their arms, the camp BOOK being full of their effects of all kinds, public and pri- XXII. wate. then, making them halt out of fight, behind Y.R. 536. the nearest mountains, he formed the foot in order B.C. 216. of battle on the left, and the cavalry on the right, and conducted the baggage, as a centre line, through the interjacent valley; intending, while the enemy should be busy and encumbered in the pillaging of the camp, as if deferted by the owners, to fall upon them by furprise. Numerous fires were left in the camp, to create a belief that his intention was, by fuch appearances, to detain the confuls in their posts, while he should gain the advantage of time, to retreat to the greater distance, in like manner as he had deceived Fabius the year before.

XLII. When day arrived, the Romans, on obferving, first, that the advanced guards had been withdrawn, and afterwards, on a nearer approach, the extraordinary filence, were filled with furprife. Then, when they discovered plainly that the camp was deferted, they ran together in crowds to the pavilions of the confuls, informing them that the enemy had fled in fuch hafte, as to leave the tents standing; and in order to conceal their flight, had left also a number of fires. They then, with loud clamours demanded, that orders should be given for the troops to march in pursuit; and, that they should plunder the camp in their way. Varro acted the same part as the common foldiers. Paullus repeatedly represented, that they ought to proceed with care and circumfpection; and, at last, when he could no otherwife restrain their mutinous proceedings, or the leader of them, he dispatched Marius Statilius, a præfect of the allies, with a troop of Lucanian horse, to procure intelligence. He rode up to the gates, and, ordering the rest to halt at the outside of the trenches, he went himself with two horsemen into the camp; and, having carefully examined every circum-

XXII. Y.R.536.

BOOK circumstance, returned and reported, that there was without doubt an ambush intended; for the fires were left in that quarter which faced the enemy, the tents were open, and every thing of value left in view; and that he had feen filver thrown at random in the passages, as if to invite a pillage. The very circumstances, mentioned with the intent of repressing their ardour for booty, served to inflame it; and the foldiers, shouting aloud, that if the signal were not given, they would proceed without their leaders; they did not long want one, for Varro instantly gave the fignal for marching. Paulius was defirous of checking this precipitancy, and being informed that the chickens had not given a favourable auspice, ordered that the ill omen should be reported to his colleague when he was just leading the troops out of the gate; whereupon Varro, though heartily vexed at this, yet from the recollection of the recent difaster of Flaminius, and of the memorable overthrow of the conful Claudius at fea, in the first Punic war, was fenfibly struck with religious foruples. The gods themselves on that day postponed, in a manner, rather than averted, the calamity which hung over the Romans: for it luckily happened, that, while the troops refused to obey the consul's orders to return into the camp, two flaves, one belonging to a horseman of Formize, the other to one of Sidicinum, who had been taken prisoners by the Numidians, among a party of foragers, in the confulate of Servilius and Atilius, made their escape on that very day to their owners; and, being brought before the confuls, informed them, that Hannibal's whole army lay in ambush behind the nearest mountains. The feafonable arrival of these men procured obedience to the authority of the confuls, when one of them, by his immoderate purfuit of popular applause, had, through improper indulgence, forfeited people's respect for their dignity, particularly with regard to himself.

XLIII. When

XLIII. When Hannibal perceived that the Ro-BOOK mans, though they took some inconsiderate steps, XXII. had not carried their rathnels to the full extent, the Y.R. 536. stratagem being now discovered, he returned with B.C. 216. disappointment to his camp. In this place he could not remain, many days, by reason of the scarcity of corn, and new measures were daily in contemplation, not only among the foldiery, a multitude compounded of the refuse of all nations, but even in the mind of the general himself; for the men begun to murmur, and afterwards proceeded with open clamours to demand the arrears of their pay, and to complain at first of the dearness of provisions, at last of famine. A report too prevailed, that the mercenary foldiers, particularly those from Spain, had formed a scheme of going over to the enemy, so that Hannibal himself is said to have sometimes entertained thoughts of flying into Gaul; intending to have left all the infantry behind, and, with the cavalry, to have made a hasty retreat. While these matters were in agitation, and this the disposition in the camp, he formed a resolution of removing into Apulia, where the weather was warmer, and confequently more favourable to the ripening of the harvest; and where, in proportion as he was placed at a greater distance from the enemy, the discontented would find defertion the more difficult. Accordingly he fet out by night, after kindling fires as before, and leaving a few tents to keep up the appearance of a camp, in the expectation that fears of an ambush, as on the former occasion, would keep the Romans within their works. But Statilius, the Lucanian, having examined all the ground beyond the camp, and on the other fide of the mountains, and bringing back an account that he had feen the enemy marching at a great distance, a consultation was held about purfuing him. Here each conful maintained the fame opinion which he had ever held; but almost all the officers

BOOK officers fiding with Varro, and no one except Ser-XXII. vilius, the consul of the former year, with Paulius, Y.R. 536. they, pursuant to the determination of the majo-B.C. 216. rity, fet forward, under the impulse of unhappy fate, to render Cannæ for ever memorable, as a scene of disaster to the Romans. Near that town Hannibal had pitched his camp, turning the rear towards the wind called Vulturnus, which, in those plains, parched with heat, carries along with it clouds of dust. As this choice of situation was highly commodious to the men, while in camp, fo was it particularly advantageous, when they were drawn up for battle; because, while the wind only blew on their backs, it would nearly blind the enemy with whom they were to fight, by carrying great quantities of dust into their faces.

> XLIV. The confuls purfued the Carthaginians, taking proper care to examine the roads; when they arrived near Cannæ, and had the foe in fight, they divided their forces, as before, and fortified two camps at nearly the same distance from each other as they had been at Geronium. As the river Aufidus ran by the camps of both, the watering parties of both had access to it, as opportunity served, but not without encountering opposition. The Romans. however, in the fmaller camp, which was pitched on the other fide of the Aufidus, had greater liberty of supplying themselves with water, because. there were none of the enemy posted on the farther bank. Hannibal, now, conceiving hopes that the confuls might be brought to an engagement in this tract, where the nature of the ground was advantageous to cavalry, in which kind of forces he had a manifest superiority, drew out his army in order of battle, and endeavoured to provoke them by skirmishes of the Numidians. On this the Roman camp was again thrown into disturbance.

ance, by mutinous behaviour in the foldiers, and BOOK diffention between the confuls; Paullus representing XXII. to Varro the fatal rashness of Sempronius and Fla-minius; and Varro to him the example of Fabius as B.C. 216. a specious precedent for timid and inactive commanders. The one calling gods and men to witness, that none of the blame was to be imputed to him, of Hannibal's now holding Italy as if by prescriptive right of possession; for that he was chained down by his colleague, while the toldiers, full of rage and ardour for the fight, were kept unarmed. To which the other replied, that, if any misfortune should happen to the legions, from their being hurried into an inconfiderate and rash engagement, he himself, although entirely free from all reproach. must yet bear a share of the consequences, be they what they might. Let him take care, that those, whose tongues were now fo ready and impetuous, shewed the same alertness during the fight.

XLV. While, instead of deliberating on proper measures, they thus wasted time in altercation, Hannibal, who had kept his forces drawn up in order of battle during a great part of the day, sled back the rest towards the camp, and dispatched the Numidian horse to the other side of the river, to attack a watering party, which had come from the smaller camp of the Romans. They had fcarcely reached the opposite bank, when, merely by their shout, and the rapidity of their motions, they dispersed this disorderly crowd; and, then pushed forward against an advanced guard, stationed before the rampart, and almost up to the very gates. The Romans, in having their camp threatened by a band of irregular auxiliaries, felt an intolerable affront, fo that nothing could have restrained them from drawing out their forces and passing the river, but from the chief command being then in the hands of Paullus. F 4

72

XXII. B.C. 216.

BOOK Paullus. On the next day, therefore, Varrow whole turn it was to command, without conferring with his colleague, displayed the signal for battle*, and mar-Y.R. 536. fhalling his forces, led them over the river, while Paullus followed; because, though he did not approve of his defign, yet he could not avoid giving him his fupport. Having croffed the river, they were joined by the troops from the smaller camp, and formed their line in this manner: in the right wing, next the river. they placed the Roman cavalry, and adjoining them the Roman infantry; the extremity of the left wing was composed of the confederate cavalry; and, inclosed by these, the confederate infantry stretched to the centre, fo as to unite with the Roman legions. The archers, and other light-armed auxiliaries, formed the van. The confuls commanded the wings, Terentius the left, Æmilius the right; the charge of the centre was commtted to Geminus Servilius.

> XLVI. Hannibal, at the first light, sending before him the Balearians, and other light-armed troops, croffed the river, and posted each company in his line of battle, in the fame order in which he had led them over. The Gallic and Spanish cavalry. occupied the left wing, near the bank, opposite the Roman cavalry, and the Numidian horse the right; the infantry forming the centre, in such a manner, that both ends of their line were composed of Africans, and between these were placed the Gauls and Spaniards. The Africans, for the most part, resembled a body of Roman troops, being furnished, in great abundance, with the arms taken partly at the Trebia, but the greater part at the Trasimenus. The shields of the Gauls and Spaniards were nearly of the fame make; their fwords were different, both in length and form; those of the Gauls being very long, and without points; BOOK those of the Spaniards, whose practice was rather to thrust at their enemy, than to strike, light and handy, and tharp at the point. The troops of these nations B.C. 216. made a more terrible appearance than any of the reft, on account of the fize of their bodies, and also of their figure. The Gauls were naked from their middle upward; the Spaniards clad in linen yests, of a furprising and dazzling whiteness, and bordered with purple. The whole number of infantry, drawn up in the field on this occasion, was forty thousand, of cavalry ten thousand. The generals, who commanded the wings, were, Haldrubal on the left, and Maharbal on the right. Hannibal himself, with his brother Mago, took the command of the centre. The fun, very conveniently for both parties, shone on their flanks, whether this position was chosen defignedly, or that it fell out by accident; for the Romans faced the fouth, the Carthaginians the north. The wind, which the natives of the country call Vulturnus, blew brilkly against the Romans, and, by driving great quantities of fand into their faces, pre-

^{*} A purple cloak raised on a spear over the Protorium.

XXII.

XLVII. The shout being raised, the auxiliaries advanced, and the fight commenced, first, between the light-armed troops; then the left wing, confifting of Gallic and Spanish cavalry, engaged with the right wing of the Romans; but not in the usual method of fighting between horsemen, for they were obliged to engage front to front, no room having been less for any evolutions, the river on one fide, and the line of infantry on the other, confining them, so that they could only push directly forward; at last, the horses being pressed together in a crowd, and stopped from advancing, the riders, grappling man to man, dragged each other to the ground. The contest was now maintained chiefly on foot, but was vented them from feeing clearly.

more

BOOK more furious than lasting; for the Roman horsemen, unable to keep their stand, turned their backs. Y.R. 536. When the fight between the cavalry was almost B.C. 216. decided, the infantry began to engage. At first, the Gauls and Spaniards maintained their ranks, without betraying any inferiority either in strength or courage. At length the Romans, by frequent and persevering efforts, with their front regular and in compact order, drove back a body which projected before the rest of their line in form of a wedge, and which, being too thin, confequently wanted strength. as these gave ground, and retreated hastily and in disorder, they pursued, and, without slackening their charge, broke through their difmayed and flying battalions; at first, to their centre line; and, at length, meeting with no refistance, they arrived at the referved troops of the Africans, which latter had been posted on both flanks of the others, inclining backward towards the rear, while the centre, composed of the Gauls and Spaniards, jutted confiderably forward. By the retreat of this prominent part, the front was first rendered even; then, by their proceeding still in the same direction, a bending inward was at length formed in the middle, on each fide of which the Africans now formed wings; and the Romans, incautiously rushing into the centre, these flanked them on each fide, and, by extending themfelves from the extremities, furrounded them on the rear also. In consequence of this, the Romans, who had already finished one battle, quitting the Gauls and Spaniards, whom they had purfued with much flaughter, entered now on a new one against the Africans, in which they had not only the disadvantage of being hemmed in and, in that position, obliged to fight, but, also, that of being fatigued, while their antagonists were fresh and vigorous.

XLVIII. By this time, the battle had begun on BOOK the left wing also of the Romans, where the confederate cavalry had been posted against the Numidians: it was languid at first, and commenced with a piece B.C. 216. of Carthaginian treachery. About five hundred Numidians, carrying, besides their usual armour and weapons, fwords concealed under their coats of mail, rode up under the appearance of deserters, with their bucklers behind their backs, and having hastily alighted from their horses, and thrown their bucklers and javelins at the feet of their enemies. were received into the centre line, and conducted thence to the hindmost ranks, where they were ordered to fit down in the rear. There they remained quiet, until the fight was begun in every quarter: when, however, the thoughts and eyes of all were deeply intent on the dispute, snatching up the shields which lay in great numbers among the heaps of the flain, they fell on the rear of the Romans, and stabbing the men in the backs, and cutting their hams, made great flaughter, and caufed still greater terror and confusion. While, in one part, prevailed difmay and flight, in another, obstinate fighting in spite of despair, Hasdrubal, who commanded on the left wing, after entirely routing the Roman cavalry, went off to the right, and, joining the Numidians, put to flight the cavalry of the allies. Then, leaving the Numidians to pursue them, with his Gallic and Spanish horse, he made a charge on the rear of the Roman infantry, while they were busily engaged with the Africans *.

XLIX. On the other fide of the field, Paullus had in the very beginning of the action, received a missions wound from a fling; nevertheless, at the head of a compact band, he frequently op-

^{*} Here the text of the original is so corrupted, as to be absolutely unintelligible. The fact, as represented in the supplemental lines, is fo related by Polybius.

Y.R.536.

BOOK posed himself in Hannibal's way; and, in several places, he restored the fight, being protected by the Roman horsemen, who, in the end, dismounted, because the consul's strength declined so far, that he was not able even to manage his horse. Some perfon, on this, telling Hannibal that the conful had ordered the cavalry to difmount, he answered, as we are told, "I should have been much better pleased " if he delivered them to me in chains." fight maintained by the difmounted cavalry was fuch as might be expected, when the enemy had gained undoubted possession of the victory: and as the vanquished chose to die on the spot, rather than fly, the victors, enraged at them for retarding their fuccess, put to death those whom they could not drive from their ground. They did, however, at length oblige them to quit the field, their numbers being reduced to a few, and those quite spent with toil and wounds. They were all entirely difperfed, and fuch as were able repaired to their horses, in order to make their escape. Cneius Lentulus, a military tribune, feeing, as he rode by, the conful fitting on a stone, and covered with blood, said to him, "Lucius Æmilius, whom the gods ought to fa-" vour, as the only person free from the blame of " this day's difaster, take this horse, while you have " any remains of strength; I will accompany you, " and am able to raise you up and protect you. Add 46 not to the fatality of the fight the death of a " conful: without that, there will be abundant cause of tears and mourning." The conful replied, "Your spirit, Cneius Cornelius, I commend > but " do not waste, in unavailing commiseration, the "fhort time allowed you for escaping out the " hands of the enemy. Go, carry a public that age " from me to the senate, that they fortify the city of "Rome; and, before the victorious Carthaginian " arrives, secure it with a powerful garrison. Carry " also a private message to Quintus Fabius; tell him 66 that

" that Lucius Æmilius has lived, and now dies, in BOOK " a careful observance of his directions. As to my- XXII. " felf, let me expire here, in the midst of my slaughtered foldiers, that I may not either be brought, B.C. 216. " a fecond time, to a trial, on the expiration of my confulship, or stand forth an accuser of my col-" league; or as if my own innocence were to be " proved by the impeachment of another." While they were thus discoursing, first, a crowd of their flying countrymen, and afterwards the enemy, came upon them; and these, not knowing the conful, overwhelmed him with their weapons. Lentulus, during the confusion, escaped through the swiftness of his horse. A general route now took place; seven thoufand men fled into the smaller camp, ten thousand into the greater, and about two thousand into the village of Cannæ; but the town not being defended by any fortifications, these were instantly surrounded by Carthalo and the cavalry. The other conful. without joining any party of his routed troops, gained Venusia, with about seventy horsemen. The number of the flain is computed at forty thoufand foot, and two thousand seven hundred horse; the loss of natives and of the confederates being nearly equal. Among these were the quæstors belonging to both confuls, Lucius Atilius, and Lucius Furius Bibaculus; twenty-one military tribunes; feveral who had passed through the offices of consul, prætor, or ædile, among whom are reckoned Cneius Servilius Geminus, and Marcus Minucius, who had been mafter of the horse in the preceding year, and conful fome years before; likewise eighty who were members of the fenate, or had borne thole offices which qualified them to be chosen into that light, and who had voluntarily enlifted as foldiers in the legions. The prisoners taken in this battle are reckoned at three thousand foot, and three hundred horse.

L. Such

Y.R. 536. B.C. 216.

BOOK L. Such was the battle of Cannæ; equally memorable with the defeat at the Allia: but as it was less fatal in its consequences, because the enemy were remiss in pursuing the blow, so, with respect to the destruction of the troops, it was more grievous and lamentable. For the flight at the Allia, while it proved the ruin of the city, preserved the men; but at Cannæ, scarcely seventy accompanied the conful who fled; almost the whole army perished with the other. Those who had collected together in the two camps, were a half-armed multitude, without leaders: from the larger was fent a message to the others, that while the enemy were funk, during the night, in profound fleep, in confequence of their fatigue in the battle, and of their feasting for joy, they should come over to them, and they would go off in one body to Canufium. This advice some totally rejected; for they said "Why did not these men come to them, when " a junction might as well have been effected "by that means? Why, but because the ground "between them was full of the enemy's troops, " and that they chose to expose to such danger "the persons of others, rather than their own?" The remainder, though they did not disapprove of the advice, were yet afraid to follow it. On this. Publius Sempronius Tuditanus, a military tribune, addressed them thes: "Do ye choose, then, to be " taken prisoners by a most rapacious and cruel " enemy, to have a price fet upon your heads, by "men who will examine, whether you are a citizen " of Rome, or a Latine confederate, in order to " pay a compliment to others, by heaping indignity " and misery upon yourselves? Surely not, if ye be " really fellow-citizens of the conful Æmilius, who " preferred an honourable death to a life of dif-"honour, and of fuch a number of brave men, 46 who lie in heaps around him. But, before the ight overtakes us, and more numerous bodies BOOK of the enemy stop up the way, let us fally forth XXII. " through those, who, without any order or regu- Y.R. 536. " larity, make this noise before our gates; courage B.C. 216. end the fword find a passage through the closest " battalions; this open and loose band we will "penetrate in the form of a wedge. Come on, then, ye who wish the preservation of yourselves " and the commonwealth, follow me." So faying, he drew his fword, and, with the troops who chose to follow him, formed as he had proposed, made his way through the midst of the enemy. Here the Numidian Javelins being thrown against their right fides, which were uncovered, they removed their shields to their right hands, and thus, to the number of fix hundred, effected a passage into the larger camp; proceeding thence, in conjunction with the other greater body, they arrived fafe at Canufium. Such were the proceedings of the vanquished, dictated rather by accident, or each man's particular feeling, than by deliberation among

LI. When the Carthaginians, flocking round Hannibal, congratulated him on the victory, and recommended, that, after going through the fatiguing business of so great a battle, he should take himself, and allow the wearied soldiers, remose during the remainder of that day and the ensuing night; Maharbal, general of cavalry, who was of opinion that no time should be lost, said to him, "that you may be convinced how much has been accomplished by this engagement, on the fifth day following you shall feast, victorious, in the Capitol. Follow me: I will advance with the horse, that the enemy may see me arrived, before they are apprised of my being on the way." To Hannibal these hopes appeared too sanguine, and the prospect too vast for

XXII. Y.R.536. B.C. 216.

BOOK his mind to comprehend at first view. He therefore replied, that "he applauded Maharbal's zeal; but "the affair required time for confideration." On which Maharbal observed, "I perceive that the " gods do not bestow on the same person all kinds " of talents. You, Hannibal, know how to acquire "victory, but you know not how to use it." There is good reason to believe that the delay of that day proved the prefervation of the city, and of the empire. On the day following, as foon as light appeared, his troops applied themselves to the collecting of the spoils, and in viewing the carnage made, which was fuch as shocked even enemies; so many thousand Romans, horsemen and footmen, lay promiscuously on the field, as chance had thrown them together, either in the battle, or flight. Some, whom their wounds, being pinched by the morning cold, had roused from their posture, were part to death, by the enemy, as they were rifing up, covered with blood, from the midst of the heaps of carcales. Some they found lying alive, with their thighs and hams cut, who, stripping their necks and threats, defired them to spill what remained of their blood. Some were found, with their heads buried in the earth, in holes which it appeared they had made for themselves, and covering then aces with earth thrown over them, had thus been fufficiated. attention of all was partice and attracted by a living Numidian with his nofe and ears strangely mangled, ilretched under a dead Roman; and who, when his hands had been rendered unable to hold a weapon, being exasperated to madness, had expired in the act of tearing his antagonist with his teeth.

> LII. After a great part of the day had been fpent in gathering the spoils, Hannibal led his troops to attack the smaller camp; and first, by drawing a trench across, excluded the garrison from the river:

but the men, being spent with labour, watching, and BOOK wounds, capitulated fooner than he had expected. XXII. It was agreed, that, besides surrendering their arms Y.R. 536. and horses, there should be paid for each Roman B.C. 216. citizen three hundred denarii*, for an ally two hundred t, for a flave an hundred t; and that, on laying down this ranfom, they should depart with fingle garments. On this, they received the enemy into the camp, and were all put into custody, but feparately; that is, the citizens and allies each by themselves. During the time spent here, such part of the troops, in the greater camp, as had fufficient strength and courage, amounting to four thousand footmen, and two hundred horse, had made their escape to Canufium; some in bodies, others, straggling different ways, through the country, a method equally fafe. The camp was furrendered to the enemy by the wounded, and those who had stayed through want of courage, and on the fame terms as for the others. Abundance of spoil was found; and the whole, (except the men and horses, and whatever filver there was, most of which was on the trappings of the latter, for there was then very little used at the table, particularly in the field,) was given up to be plundered. Hannibal then ordered the bodies of his men to be collected and buried: they are faid to have amounted to eight thousand of the bravest of his troops. Some writers fay, that he also searched for, and interred the Roman conful. Those who escaped to Canusium, and who received, from the inhabitants, no farther relief than admittance within their walls and houses, were supplied with corn, clothes, and subsistence, by a woman of Apulia, named Busa, eminent for her birth and riches; in requital of which munificence, high honours were afterwards paid to her, by the fenate, at the conclufion of the war.

BOOK XXII.

LIII. Now, although there were four military tribunes present at Canusium; of the first legion, Fabius Maximus, whose father had been dictator the Y.R. 536. year before; of the fecond, Lucius Publicius Bibalus, and Publius Cornelius Scipio; and, of the third, Appius Claudius Pulcher, who had been ædile the last year; yet the command in chief was, with universal consent, conferred on Publius Scipio; then very young, in conjunction with Appius Claudius. While these, with a few others, were consulting on the measures requisite in this emergency, they were told by Publius Furius Philus, fon to a man of confular dignity, that "it was vain for them to cherish "hopes in a case past retrieving; for the com-"monwealth was despaired of, and lamented as " loft. That feveral young men of the nobility, " at whose head was Lucius Cacilius Metellus, " were meditating a scheme of putting to sea, " with intent to abandon Italy, and go over to the "king of some other country." This distressing incident, besides having in itself the most fatal tendency, coming unexpectedly, and immediately after fo many difasters, surprised and astonished them to fuch a degree, that they loft for a time all thought and motion; those who were present then, advising that a council should be called on the subject; Scipio, a youth destined by fate to conduct the war to a conclusion, faid, that "this was not a " fubject for council; the bufiness required not " deliberation, but fortitude and action. He bade 66 those come with him, that moment, in arms, who wished the preservation of the commonwealth; for " no place," faid he, " can you more truly call an enemy's camp, than that wherein such designs are " agitated." Immediately he proceeded, attended by a few, to the lodging of Metellus; and finding there the youths, who had been mentioned, affembled in confultation, he held his drawn fword over their heads as they fat, and faid, "with fince"rity of heart I swear, that I will not desert the BOOK commonwealth of the Roman people; neither will I suffer any other Roman citizen to desert it. Y.R. 536. If, knowingly, I break this oath, then do thou, B.C. 216. Jupiter, supremely good and great, overwhelm, in the severest ruin, myself, my house, my family, and my fortune. Lucius Cæcilius, and the rest of you, here present, I insist upon your taking the same oath: he that will not swear, be it known, that against him this sword is drawn." Terrified no less than if they had seen the victorious Hannibal, they all took the oath, and surrendered themselves to Scipio, to be kept in custody.

LIV. While these things passed at Canusium, about four thousand horse and foot, who, in the flight, had been dispersed through the country, came to the conful at Venusia. These were all distributed by the Venusians through their several families, where they were received and treated with kindness. They also gave to each horseman a gown and tunic, and twenty-five denarii *; and to each footman ten denariit, and fuch arms as were wanted; and every other hospitable attention was shewn them, both by the public and by private persons; all exerting themselves, that the Venusian state might not be out-done, in kindness, by a woman of Canufium. However, the great number of her guests, which amounted now to ten thousand, made the burthen heavier on Busa. Appius and Scipio, as foon as they learned that one of the confuls was alive, instantly dispatched to him an account of the number of horse and foot which were with them; at the fame time defiring his orders, whether the troops should be brought to him in Venusia, or remain at Canufium. Varno led over his forces

^{* 16}s. 13d. + 6s. 53d.

BOOK to Canusium. And now, there was some appear-XXII. ance of a confular army, and they seemed capable of defending themselves, though not with their arms B.C. 216. alone, yet certainly with the help of walls. At Rome accounts were received, that not even these relics of the citizens and allies had furvived, but that both armies, with the confuls, were utterly cut off. Never, while the city itself was in safety, did such a degree of dismay and confusion prevail within the walls of Rome. I therefore shrink from the task; and will not undertake to describe a scene, of which any representation that I could give, would fall short of the reality. The report was; not of fuch another wound being received, as when a conful and an army were lost, the year before, at the Trasimenus, but of a multiplicity of disasters; of both armies, together with both confuls, being lost; that the Romans had now neither camp, nor general, nor foldier existing; that Hannibal was in possession of Apulia, Samnium, and of almost all Italy. Certainly we know no other nation whose spirit would not have been wholly crushed under such an immense load of missortunes. Can I compare with it the difaster, suffered by the Carthaginians, in the fea-fight at the Ægatian islands, by which they were so dispirited that they gave up Sicily and Sardinia, and were content thenceforth to pay tribute and taxes? Or, the loss of the battle in Africa, under which this same Hannibal afterwards funk? In no particular are they to be compared, except in this, that the latter, under their calamities, displayed nothing like an equal degree of magnanimity.

> LV. The prætors, Publius Furius Philus, and Marcus Pomponius, convened the senate in the Curia Hostilia, to consult on the means of providing for the fecurity of the city. They took it for granted that, the armies being destroyed, the enemy would would come directly to attack Rome, the only object BODK which remained to be accomplished in order to finish XXII. the war. As, in a case of such extreme danger, the Y.R. 536. extent of which was not thoroughly known, they B.C. 216. found it difficult to resolve on any plan, and were, at the same time, stunned with the cries and lamentations of the women; for no positive information being yet received, the living and dead were, all together, lamented as loft, in almost every house. Quintus Fabius Maximus gave his opinion, that 66 fwift horsemen should be fent along the Appian " and Latine roads, who, inquiring from any whom " they should meet, straggling in their flight from " the field, might perhaps bring back information as " to the real fituation of the confuls and the armies; " and, if the immortal gods, in compassion to the " empire, had left any remnant of the Roman " name; where these forces were; to what quarter 46 Hannibal directed his route, after the battle; " what were his intentions; what he was doing and " preparing to do. These particulars ought to be "inquired into, and afcertained, by active young "men; and the fenators themselves, as there was " not a sufficient number of magistrates, ought to " undertake the part of quieting the tumult and dif-" order of the city; to remove the women from the " public places, and oblige them to confine them-" felves within their own doors; to restrain the la-"mentations of the feveral families; to cause filence " in the city; to take care that expresses arriving " with any intelligence, be conducted to the præ-"tors; and to make every person wait, in his own "house, for information respecting his own con-" cerns. That they should moreover place guards " at the gates, to hinder any from going out, and " force men to place their only hope of preservation " in the strength of their walls and works. " when the tumult should be appealed, then the se-" nators might properly be called back into the BOOK "house to deliberate on measures for the defence of XXII. " the city."

G 3

Y.R.536. B.C.216.

LVI. This opinion being unanimously approved, and the crowd being removed out of the Forum by the magistrates, the senators dispersed themselves on all fides to quiet the commotions; and then, at length, a letter was brought from the conful Terentius, informing them, that " the conful Lucius " Æmilius, and the army, were cut off; that he 66 himfelf was at Canufium, collecting, as from a " shipwreck, the relics of such a dreadful missfortune; that there were, with him, about ten "thousand men, belonging to many different corps, " and not yet formed into regular bodies. That " the Carthaginian, shewing neither the spirit of a " conqueror, nor the conduct of a great general, " lay still at Cannæ, bargaining about the prisoners " and other booty." Then the losses of private families also were made known through their several houses; and so entirely was the whole city filled with grief, that the anniversary festival of Ceres was omitted, because it is not allowable for persons in mourning to celebrate it, and there was not, at the time, one matron who was not fo habited. Left, therefore, for the fame reason, other festivals, public or private, might be left uncelebrated, the wearing of that dress was, by a decree of senate, limited to thirty days. Now, when the tumult in the city was composed, and the fenators re-assembled in their house, another letter was brought from Sicily, from the pro-prætor Titus Otacilius, stating, that "a "Carthaginian fleet was ravaging the dominions of "Hiero; and that, when he was preparing to carry 46 affistance to him, in compliance with his earnest " request, he had received intelligence that another " fleet lay at the Ægatian islands, prepared for battle, and intending, as foon as they learned that he had " gone away to guard the coast of Syracuse, to fall " immediately

OF ROME.

"immediately on Lilybæum, and other parts of the BOOK
Roman province. If, therefore, they wished to XXII.

" protect Sicily, and the king their ally, a re-inforce-

" ment of ships must be sent."

XXII. Y.R.536. B.C.216.

LVII. When the letters of the conful and proprætor were read, it was refolved that Marcus Claudius, who commanded the fleet lying at Oftia, should be fent to take the command of the forces at Canufium; and that a letter should be written to the conful, directing, that as foon as he had delivered the army to the prætor, he should, with all the expedition confisting with the public good, come to Rome. addition to all their misfortunes, people were also terrified by feveral prodigies; and, particularly, by two vestals, Opimia and Floronia, being, in that year, convicted of incontinence; one of them was, according to custom, buried alive, near the Colline gate; the other voluntarily put an end to her own life. Lucius Cantilius, secretary to one of those, whom we now call the leffer pontiffs, who had debauched Floronia, was, by order of the chief pontiff, scourged in the Forum, with such severity, that he expired under the punishment. This enormity happening in the midst of so many calamities, was, as usual in such cases, converted into a prodigy, and the decemvirs were ordered to confult the books. Ouintus Fabius Pictor was fent also to Delphi, to confult the oracle, and discover by what supplications, and worship, they might be able to appease the gods; and by what means a stop might be put to fuch a heavy train of misfortunes. Meanwhile, according to the directions of the books of the fates, feveral extraordinary facrifices were performed; among which a male and female Gaul, and a male and female Greek, were buried alive in the cattle market, in a vault built round with stone; a place which had already, by a practice abhorrent from the temper of the religion of Rome, been polluted with human

G 4

88

BOOK human victims. When it was thought that fufficient atonement had been made to the wrath of the gods, Marcus Claudius Marcellus dispatched from Oftia to Rome, for the fecurity of the city, one thousand five hundred men, whom he had there, and who had been raised for the service of the fleet. He also fent on before him the marine legion, which was the third, under command of the military tribunes, to Teanum, in the territory of Sidicinum; and then, having delivered the command of the fleet to his colleague, Publius Furius Philus, he repaired himself, in a few days, by forced marches, to Canusium. Pursuant to directions of the senate, Marcus Junius was nominated dictator, and Tiberius Sempronius mafter of the horse. They proclaimed a levy, and enlifted all the youth of feventeen years and upwards, and even some under that age, of whom they completed four legions, and a thousand horse. Envoys were also fent to the allies, and Latine confederates, with a requisition of their contingents of troops, as specified by treaty. Orders were issued for preparing armour, weapons, and other necessaries; and they even took down from the temples and porticoes the old spoils taken from ene-The urgent necessity, and the scarcity of men of free condition, occasioned their adopting a new mode of raifing foldiers, and in an extraordinary manner. They purchased, with the public money, eight thousand stout young slaves; asking each, whether he was willing to ferve in the wars; and then gave them arms. They preferred employing this kind of foldiers, though they had it in their power to have ranfomed the prisoners at a less expence.

> LVIII. Hannibal, intoxicated with his great fuccess at Cannæ, conducted himself as if, instead of having a war to profecute, he had already brought it to a conclusion. Ordering the prisoners to be brought forth.

ðġ

forth, he separated the allies from the rest; and, BOOK with expressions of kindness, dismissed them without XXII. ransom, as he had done formerly at the Trebia, and Y.R. 536. Even the Romans he called B.C. 216. the lake Trafimenus. before him; and, contrary to his former practice, addressed them in very mild terms, telling them, that " he meant not to carry the war to the extinc-"tion of the Romans, but fought for glory and em-" pire. That, as his predecessors had yielded to the "Roman bravery, so he, on his part, was now endea-" vouring to make others yield, in turn, to his va-" lour and good fortune. Wherefore he would give 66 them permission to ransom themselves; and the "terms should be, five hundred denarii * for each "horseman, three hundred † for a footman, and a "hundred for a flave t." Though the ranfom of the horseman was hereby raised beyond the rate stipulated on their furrendering, yet they joyfully em-It was determined, that they braced any terms. should choose, by their own suffrages, ten of their number, who should go to Rome to the senate; and of their faith, no other fecurity was required than their oath, that they would return. With these was fent Carthalo, a noble Carthaginian, who, if he perceived an inclination towards peace, was to propose After they had fet out from the camp, one of them, a man devoid of Roman principles, pretending to have forgotten fomething, with a view of evading his oath, returned into the camp, and afterwards, before night, overtook his companions. When it was reported at Rome, that they were coming, a lictor was fent to meet Carthalo, with orders, in the name of the dictator, that he should quit the Roman territories before night.

LIX. The deputies of the prisoners, being by the dictator admitted to an audience of the senate, ^{* 16}l. 28. 11d. † 91, 138. 9d. 31. 48. 7d.

BOOK the principal of them, Marcus Junius, spoke to this XXII. effect: "Conscript Fathers, none of us is ignorant, that no other state ever considers prisoners in a Y.R. 536. " lower light than ours does. However, unless we " are too partial to our own cause, none, who ever " fell into the power of an enemy, less deserved to " be neglected than we do. For we did not, through " cowardice, furrender our arms in the field; but, " after having protracted the battle until near night, " standing on the heaped bodies of the flain, we retreated within our works. During the remain-" der of that day, and the ensuing night, spent as " we were with toil and wounds, we yet defended " our camp. Next day, being entirely furrounded " by the army of the conquerors, and debarred " from access to water, having no hope of forcing a " way through their numerous bands, and not con-" ceiving it criminal, that, after the flaughter of "fifty thousand of our army, any Roman soldier should survive the battle of Cannæ, we, "at length, agreed to terms of ranfom, 46 which our liberty should be purchased; and we 66 delivered to the enemy our weapons, when they " could no longer ferve to defend us. We had 66 heard that our ancestors ransomed themselves with " gold from the Gauls; and that our fathers, not-" withstanding their utter dislike to the acceptance of " the terms of peace, yet fent ambaffadors to Taren-" tum, for the purpose of ransoming prisoners. Yet, 66 both the fight at the Allia with the Gauls, and 46 that at Heraclea with Pyrrhus, may be called dif-" graceful, on account of the panic and flight. "Whereas the plains of Cannæ are overspread with 66 heaps of flaughtered Romans; and, that we furvive, is owing to no other cause, than from the enemy " having, in killing, exhausted their strength. here " are, besides, some of our number who are not " even chargeable with flying the field; having " been left to guard the camp, when that was fur-" rendered

" rendered, they fell into the hands of the enemy. BOOK "I envy not the good fortune, or the fituation, of XXII. " any fellow citizen or fellow foldier, nor do I wish, Y.R.5 6. " by depressing another, to exalt myself; but surely, B.C. 216. " unless there is some prize due to swiftness of foot, "those men who fled, leaving most of their " arms behind, and never halted until they came "to Venusia, or Canusium, cannot justly claim " a preference before us, or boast of themselves as " more capable of affording defence to the com-" monwealth. However, ye will find them on " trial good and valiant foldiers, and will find " us also the more heartily zealous in our coun-66 try's cause, from the consideration of having " been, in kindness, redeemed and reinstated by " you. Ye are enlifting men of every age and " condition. I hear that eight thousand flaves " are to be armed. Our number is not inferior 66 to that, and we may be ranfomed at lefs ex-" pence than they are purchased. A compari-"fon between ourlelves and them would be an " infuit on the name of Roman. I think, Con-" fcript Fathers, that, in such a case, this circumstance " also deserves consideration, (if ye choose to act to-" wards us with a degree of rigour, which we have, "by no means, merited,) the nature of the enemy, . " in whofe hands ye would leave us, whether he " is fuch as Pyrrhus, who treated us, when his pri-" foners, as if we were his guests; or a barbarian, " and a Carthaginian; of whom it can scarcely be "determined, whether his avarice or cruelty be greater. If ye were to behold the chains, the " fqualid drefs, and the miferable looks of your " countrymen, the fight, I am convinced, would " affect you not less deeply, than if ye saw your " less prostrate on the plains of Cannæ. Ye can here observe the solitude, and the tears of BOOK "our relations, who stand in the porch of your XXII. "fenate house, waiting for your determination: "when they fuffer such suspense and anxiety Y.R. 536. "for us, and for those who are absent, what " do ye suppose must be the state of those men's "minds whose liberty and life are at stake? "Believe me, that, even should Hannibal, con-" trary to his nature, behave with lenity towards " us, yet life would be no gratification, after having been adjudged by you unworthy of be-"ing ranfomed. Formerly, prisoners, dismissed by Pyrrhus without ransom, returned home " to Rome. But they returned with ambassa-"dors, the principal men in the state, who had 66 been fent for the purpose of ransoming them. "Should I return to my country, whom my fel-" low citizens have not valued, as worth three " hundred denarii; Conscript Fathers, every man " has his own way of thinking; I know that my " person and life are in hazard: but I am more " deeply affected by the danger to our reputation, left " we should appear to be rejected and condemned " by you. For the world will never believe that ye " were actuated by the motive of faving money."

> LX. When he ceased speaking, the multitude, who flood in the Comitium, instantly raised a lamentable cry, and stretching their hands toward the fenate house, belought the members to restore to them their children, their brethren, and relations. Their fears, and the urgency of the case, had brought a number of women also among the crowd of men in the Forum. The senate, as soon as the house was cleared, took the matter into confideration. Opinions were different; fome recommended that the prisoners should be ranged at the expence of the public; others, that the public money money should not be expended, but that they should BOOK not be hindered from ranfoming themselves, with XXII. their own private property; and that, to such as Y R 536. wanted money at present, it should be lent out of B.C.216. the treasury, on their indemnifying the nation by fureties and mortgages. Titus Manlius Torquatus, a man who carried primitive strictness, as many thought, to too great a degree of rigour, on being asked his opinion, spoke to this effect: "Had the " demands of the deputies, in favour of those who " are in the hands of the enemy, gone no farther " than to their being ranfomed, I should, without " offering centure on any of them, have delivered " my judgment in few words; for what elfe would " be requisite than to admonish you, to maintain the " practice transmitted from your forefathers, and " to adhere to a precedent effential to military difcipline? But now, fince they have, in a man-" ner, made a merit of having furrendered them-" felves to the foe, and claimed a preference, not 66 only over those who were made prisoners in the "field, but even over those who made their way " to Venusia and Canusium, and over the con-" ful Caius Terentius himfelf, I will not let you re-" main ignorant, Conscript Fathers, of any of the " circumstances which occurred on the occasion. "And I wish that the representations, which I " am going to lay before you, were made in the of the troops themselves at Canusium, the most competent witnesses of every man's cowardice and bravery; or, at least, that one par-"ticular person were present here, Publius Sem-" pronius, the counsel and example of which officer, 66 had those soldiers thought proper to follow, they " would to-day be Romans in their own camp, not "the oners in that of the enemy." But as the "Carthaginians were fatigued with fighting, or to-" tally occupied in rejoicing for their fuccess, in "which state indeed most of them had even retired " into

Y.R.536. B.C. 216.

BOOK " into their camp,—they had it in their power " during the whole night to extricate themselves " by fallying forth; and though seven thousand " foldiers had been able to force their way, even "through close battalions, yet they, neither of "themselves, offered to attempt the same, nor "were willing to follow the lead of another. " Publius Sempronius Tuditanus never ceased ad-" vifing and exhorting them, that while the num-" bers of the enemy round the camp were few, " while quiet and filence prevailed, while the night " covered their design, they would follow where he should lead; assuring them that, before day " light, they might arrive in places of fafety " in the cities of their allies. If he had faid in " like manner, as in the time of our grand-fathers, " Publius Decius, military tribune in Samnium, " spoke, or, as in our own time, and in the for-" mer Punic war, Calphurnius Flamma faid to the " three hundred volunteers, when he was leading them " to feize on an eminence fituated in the midst of the " enemy, Soldiers, LET US DIE, AND BY OUR DEATHS " EXTRICATE THE SURROUNDED LEGIONS FROM THE " AMBUSCADE.—If Publius Sempronius had spoken "thus, I fay, he could not furely deem you either "Romans or men, if no one appeared ready to accom-" pany him in so brave an enterprise. But still he " points out the way which leads not to glory only "but to fafety. He shews how ye may return to your country, your parents, wives, and children. "Do ye want spirit for your own preservation? What " would ye do if the cause of your country required " your death? Fifty thousand of your countrymen " and allies lie around you flain on that fame day. " If fo many examples of bravery do not rouse " you, nothing will ever rouse you; if such a " carnage has not inspired contempt of life, no other " will. While in freedom and fafety, wish for your " country: do this as long as it is your country.

It is now too late for you to wish for it, when ye BOOK " are divested of its privileges, disfranchised of the XXII. "rights of citizens, and become flaves of the Car-Y.R.536." thaginians. Will ye return, on terms of purchase, B.C. 216. " to that condition, which ye relinquished through " pufillanimity and cowardice? To Publius Sem-" pronius, your countryman, ordering you to take " arms and follow him, ye would not liften; ye " liftened foon after to Hannibal, ordering you to " betray your camp to him, and furrender your " arms. Why do I charge them with cowardice, " when I may charge them with actions highly cri-" minal? for they not only refused to follow the " person who gave them the best advice, but at-"temped to hinder and to stop him, had not his " gallant companions with their drawn fwords " cleared the way of those dastards. I affirm, that " Publius Sempronius was obliged to force his " paffage through a body of his countrymen, before " he broke through that of the enemy. Has our " country any reason to wish for such citizens as "these; to whom, if the rest had been like, we " fhould not have had this day one citizen of those " who fought at Cannæ. Out of feven thousand " men, fix hundred were found, who had spirit to " force their way, who returned home with freedom " and their arms, forty thousand of the enemy not " being able to stop them. How safely then do ye " fuppose might a band of near two legions have " passed? In that case, Conscript Fathers, ye would " have had this day, at Canufium, twenty thousand " foldiers, brave and faithful. But how can these " men be good and faithful citizens, (for to bravery " they do not themselves lay claim,) after having " attempted to stop the fally of those that wished " to trust all to their swords? Or who can sup-" pofe, that they do not look with envy on the " fafety and glory, which the others have acquired

BOOK " by their valour, while they fee themselves reduced "by their fear and cowardice, to ignominious " flavery. The entire band chose to remain in Y.R.536. "their tents, and wait the approach of day, and of B.C. 216. "their tents, and wan the appropriate the enemy, at the same time; though during the " filence of the night they had a fair opportunity of " effecting their escape. But though they wanted " confidence to fally out of the camp, they had " courage valiantly to defend it. Being besieged " for feveral days and nights, they protected their " rampart by arms: at length, after the utmost " efforts and fufferings, when every support of life " failed, when their strength was wasted through "hunger, and they could no longer bear up under 66 their arms, they were overcome by necessities "too powerful for human nature to fullain, and a " part with Sempronius gained the greater camp. " Now, at fun rife, the enemy approached the rame part, and before the fecond hour these men who 46 had refused to accompany him without trying the " iffue of any dispute, surrendered their arms and "themselves. Here, then, is the amount of their " martial performances during two days; when they "ought to have stood in their posts in the battle, " and fought, they then fled to their camp; which, " instead of defending, they surrendered; shewing " themselves equally useless there, and in the field. "Shall I then ranfom fuch as you? When ye ought " to fally forth from your camp, ye helitate and " ftay there; and when staying, there is a necessity " for defending it, ye make furrender of your arms, " and yourselves. Conscript Fathers, I would no " more vote for ranfoming those men, than I would " for delivering up to Hannibal the others, who "forced their way out of the camp, through the midst of the enemy, and by the highest exertions " of valour restored themselves to their country."

LXI. After this discourse of Manlius, notwith- BOOK flanding that most of the senators had relations among XXII. the prisoners, yet, besides the maxim generally ob- Y.R.536. ferved by the state, which, from the earliest times, B.C.216. had ever shewed very little tenderness towards such, the confideration of the money requisite for the ransom operated with them as a powerful argument; indeed they were unwilling either that the treasury should be exhausted, from which a great fum had already been iffued for purchasing and arming the flaves for fervice, or that Hannibal should receive so considerable a supply, and of which he was A harsh answer faid to stand in the greatest need. then being given, that the prisoners should not be ransomed, and this new cause of grief, in the loss of fo many citizens, being added to the former, the people escorted the deputies to the gate with abundance of tears and lamentations. One of the deputies left the rest, and went home, as if he had fulfilled his oath, by fallaciously returning into the camp. But, as foon as this became known, and was reported to the fenate, they unanimously voted, that he should be seized, and conveyed to Hannibal, under a guard appointed by the government. affair of the prisoners is related in another manner: that ten deputies came at first; and that the senate were for some time in doubt whether they should be admitted into the city or not; but that at length permission was granted them to enter it: but still they were refused an audience of the senate: and that afterwards, on their staying longer than the rest expected, three others were fent, Lucius Scribonius, Caius Calpurnius, and Lucius Manlius. last, the business of ransoming the prisoners was proposed to the senate by a plebeian tribune, a relation of Scribonius, and their determination was, that they should not be ransomed. On this the three deputies, who came last, returned to Hannibal, but the ten

H

former

BOOK former remained at Rome; as if, by having returned

XXII. Y.R.536. to Hannibal, after fetting out on their journey, under pretext of getting a complete list of the prisoners, they had fulfilled their oath. The question, whether they should be delivered up to the enemy, was warmly debated in the fenate, and the party who voted in the affirmative were evercome by a finall majority. However, they were by the next cenfors fo feverely branded with every mark of ignominy, that fome of them laid violent hands on themselves, and the rest, during all the remainder of their lives, shunned not only the Forum, but almost the public street, and the light. While such difference, in the representations given by historians, may be wondered at, still there are no means of diftinguishing the truth. The greatness of the present misfortune, beyond any hitherto fustained, is demonstrated by this circumstance; that the allies, who, until this time, had stood firm in their attachment, now began to waver; for no other reason, certainly, than that they despaired of the commonwealth. The following states actually revolted to the Carthaginians, during the war: the Atellans, the Calatians, the Hirpinians, a part of the Apulians, the Samnites, excepting the Pentrians, all the Bruttians, the Lucanians, and, besides these, the Surrentinians; almost the whole coast possessed by the Greeks, the Tarentines, Metapontines, Crotonians, Locrians, and all the Cifalpine Gauls. Yet did not all these losses and revolts of their allies shake the firmness of the Romans so far as to induce them ever once to make mention of peace, either before the conful's return to Rome, or when his arrival renewed the memory of their misfortune. But at that very time, fuch magnanimity was shewn by the state, that, on the conful's approaching the city, after fuch a heavy dilaster, of which he, in particular, had been the principal cause, all ranks of people not only went out in crowds to meet him, BOOK but even returned him thanks for not having defipaired of the commonwealth; whereas, had he y.R 536. been a general of the Carthaginians, there is no degree of punishment beyond what he must have suffered."

HISTORY OF ROME.

BOOK XXIII.

The Campanians revolt to Hannibal. Hanno moves in the senate of Carthage to propose terms of peace to the Romans; his proposition strenuously opposed, and over-ruled by the Barcine faction. Marcellus defeats Hannibal, in a battle at Nola. Hannibal's army enervated by luxurious living at Cashilmum besieged by the Carthaginians, is reduced Cabua. to fuch extremity by famine, that the people eat the leathern covers of their shields, and even mice. One hundred and ninety-seven new members, from the equestrian order, added to the senate. Lucius Postumius, prætor, with his army, defeated by the Gauls, and flain. Cneius Scipio, and Publius, overcome Hasdrubal in Spain, and conquer that country. The remaining troops of the army vanquished at Canna, fent to Sicily, there to remain during the continuance of the war. An alliance formed between Philip, king of Macedonia, and Hannibal. Sempronius Gracchus, consul, defeats the Campanians. Successes of Titus Manlius in Sardinia; be takes prisoners, Hasdrubal, the general, Mago, and Hanno. Claudius Marcellus gives Hannibal's army a fecond defeat at Nola; and, at length, gives the Romans hopes of a favourable termination of the war.

BOOK XXIII.

T.R.536.

A FTER the battle of Cannæ, Hannibal, as foon as he had taken and facked the Roman camps, removed hastily from Apulia into Samnium, being invited into the territory of Arpi by Statius Trebius, B.C. 216. who promised to deliver the city of Compsa into his hands.

hands. Trebius was a native of Compla, of confi- BOOK derable note among his countrymen, but thwarted XXIII. in his ambitious views by a faction of the Mopfian Y.R. 536. family, which, through the favour of the Romans, B.C. 216. had acquired the principal direction of affairs. When an account was received of the battle of Cannæ, and Trebius openly announced the approach of Hannibal, the Mopsian party withdrew from the city; on which it was, without a contest, surrendered to the Carthaginian, and a garrison of his troops received into it. Hannihal, leaving here all the booty, together with his baggage, and dividing his army into two parts, ordered Mago, with one division, to receive such cities of that country as were willing to revolt from the Romans, and if any should refuse, to compel them by force; while he himself, at the head of the other, marched through the country of Campania, towards the lower fea, intending to lay fiege to Neapolis, in order to gain possession of a sea-port town. On entering the frontiers of the Neapolitans, he placed one half of his Numidians in ambush, in places suited to the purpose; and, in general, the roads run through deep vallies, and form windings commodious for concealment: the rest he ordered to drive before them, in open view of the enemy, the prey collected in the country; and to ride up, in a menacing manner, to the gates. Against this party, which appeared to be neither regular nor numerous, a fally was made by a foundron of horse, which, by the others retreating on purpose, was drawn into the ambuscade, surrounded, and cut to pieces. Nor would one of them have escaped, had not the sea been so near, and fome veffels, mostly fishing smacks, which were in view at a small distance from shore, afforded shelter to fuch as were able to fwim. Several young men of distinction, however, were slain and taken in this action, among whom fell Hegeas, the general of the cavalry, too eagerly purfuing the enemy in their re-

H 3

BOOK treat. The Carthaginian was deterred from under-XXIII. taking the fiege of the city, by the fight of the fortifications, which shewed that the enterprise would be B.C. 216: attended with considerable difficulty.

> II. From hence he marched to Capua; where, in confequence of a long course of prosperity, and the kind indulgence of fortune, the manners of the people were become extremely diffolute and licentious; and amidst the universal corruption, the commons particularly diffinguished themselves, by the extravagancy of their conduct, carrying their notions of liberty to the most unbounded excess. person, named Pacuvius Calavius, of noble birth, and, at the fame time, a great favourite of the plebeians, but indebted for his popularity to intrigues of no very honourable kind, had rendered the fenate dependent on his will, and that of the commons. He happened to be invested with the chief magistracy during that year, wherein the Romans were defeated at the Trasimenus; and suspected that, on an opportunity fo favourable for effecting a revolution, the commons, who had fo long harboured a bitter animofity against the fenate, would attempt some important enterprize; and that, if Hannibal should come into those parts with his victorious army, they would even go fo far as to murder the fenate, and deliver Capua into the hands of the Carthaginians. Though a man of profligate manners, yet, not being utterly abandoned, he preferred ruling the commonwealth in its present settled state to any power which he could hope for, in case of its subversion; and knowing the impossibility of any state remaining settled, if destitute of counfel to direct its affairs, he fet about the execution of a plan whereby he might preserve the senate, and, at the same time, keep it in awe of himself and his party. Having convened that body, he began, by telling them, "that the defign of re

" volting from the Romans, unless such a measure BOOK " should be found absolutely necessary, could not XXIII. "by any means be agreeable to him, who had " children by the daughter of Appius Claudius, and BC. 216 " had disposed of a daughter of his own in mar-" riage, at Rome, to Livius; but that, however, " an affair of much greater moment, and more " alarming tendency, required their attention: for, 46 the purpose of the commons was not, by chang-"ing fides, to abolish the authority of the senate; "but, by massacring the members to leave the com-"monwealth without a head, and in that state to de-" liver it up to Hannibal and the Carthaginians. "From this imminent danger, it was in his power, " (he faid,) to deliver them, if they would entrust " themselves to his management, and, forgetting " party animolities, place entire confidence in him." Overcome by the violence of their fears, they all confented to be directed by him; on which he faid, "I " will thut you up in the fenate house, appearing as " an accomplice in their wicked plot, and while I 66 feem to approve of designs which I should in vain " oppose, I will find out a way for your safety. " the performance of this I am willing to give you " any fecurity which you may demand." Having foleranly pledged his faith, he went out, and ordered the fenate-house to be shut, leaving a guard in the porch, with orders, that no one should go in or out without his directions.

III. He then convened the people, to whom, he faid, "Campanians, the opportunity for which " you have so often prayed, of taking vengeance " on a wicked and detestable senate, now pre-" fents itself in such a manner, that you may accom-" plish your wishes, without any hazard of danger " to yourselves, in storming, by force of arms, their " feveral houses which they keep secured by gar-H 4

BOOK "risons of their dependents and slaves. I am XXIII. " ready to deliver into your hands, the whole body 66 of them shut up together in the senate-house, un-Y.R. 336. " attended, unarmed. Nor need you do any thing " in a hurry, or without confideration. I will take care that you shall have full power of passing fen-" tence of life or death on every one of them: fo " that each may fuffer the punishment which he has 66 deferved. Above all things, however, it behoves " you, while you indulge the gratification of your " refentment, to make even that give place to the " care of your own interest and welfare. For, the " object of your hatred is, as I apprehend, the pre-" fent body of fenators; you do not wish that the commonwealth should be entirely without a senate: " for you must have either a king, an office univer-66 fally detefted; or a fenate, the only kind of government compatible with freedom in a state. You must therefore do two things at the same time. remove the old fenate, and elect a new one. " will order each of the fenators to be fummoned " before you; concerning whose life or death I will " require your judgment: whatever your fentence " is, it shall be executed. But first, before punishment is inflicted on the guilty, you will elect, into "his place, as a new fenator, fome person of ability " and fpirit." He then took his feat; and the names of the fenators being thrown together into an urn, he ordered the first that happened to come out, on shaking the lots, to be proclaimed, and the perfon himself to be brought out from the senate-house. On hearing the name, every one eagerly cried out, that he was a worthless character, and a wicked man; and that he deserved punishment. Pacuvius then faid, "I perceive what judgment has been passed " on this man. He is expelled. In the room of " this worthless and wicked fenator, elect one en-66 dowed with probity and justice." A general filence filence at first took place, from the difficulty of find- BOOK ing a better substitute in his room; and afterwards, XXIII. fome one breaking through referve, and proposing a Y.R.536. certain person, a clamour was instantly raised louder B.C. 216. than against the other; some declaring, that they did not know him; others exclaiming, at one time, against his scandalous behaviour, at another, against his meanness, his fordid poverty, and the disreputable trade or occupation which he followed. fame confequences enfued, and the difficulty still increafed, on the fecond and third fenator being fummoned; all which clearly proved that the people difliked the men in question, but were totally at a loss for one whom they could fet in his place; for it would answer no purpose to propose the same persons a second time, whose nomination had produced nothing but a recital of their difgraces, and the rest were still more mean and obscure than those who first occurred to people's thoughts. The confequence was, that the people withdrew from the affembly, affirming, that the evil with which men were best acquainted was the most tolerable, and ordering the fenate to be discharged from custody.

IV. Pacuvius, by this obligation conferred on the senate, in thus preserving their lives, so effectually gained their affections, that they were much more earnestly disposed to support his interest, than that of the commons; and now, all ranks yielding a ready compliance with his defigns, without having recourse to force of arms, he ruled with unlimited authority, Henceforward the fenators, casting off all regard to their independence and their dignity, paid court to the commons, and faluted them in courteous terms; invited them, with every expreffion of kindness, to their houses, and then entertained them fumptuously; always undertook that fide of a controversy, supported that cause, and appointed

BOOK pointed judges agreeable to that party, which was XXIII. most popular, and seemed best calculated to con-Y.R. 536. ciliate the favour of the populace. No business B.C. 216. was transacted in the senate in any other manner, than just as if it had consisted of a set of plebeians. The people had ever been prone to luxurious extravagance; not only from an evil propenfity in their nature, but likewife through the profusion of voluptuous enjoyments that lay within their reach. and the temptations to which they were exposed in the midst of every means of gratification which land or fea could afford. But now, in confequence of the condescension and indulgence shewn by persons of the first consequence, they ran into fuch exorbitant excess as fet no limits either to their defires or expences. They had long cast off all respect for their own magistrates, senate, and laws; and now, fince the unfortunate battle of Cannæ, they began to look with contempt on the government of Rome also, which alone they had, until then, regarded with fome degree of awe. only confiderations that withheld them from an immediate revolt, were, that by means of intermarriages contracted in a long course of time, many of their most illustrious and powerful families were connected with the Romans; and, besides that many of their countrymen ferved in the Roman armies, their strongest motive for restraining their inclination, was, concern for three hundred horsemen of the noblest families in Campania, who had been felected by the Romans, and fent into feveral garrifons in the cities of Sicily.

> V. The parents and relations of thele, with great difficulty, prevailed on the people to find ambaf-fadors to the Roman conful. They him at Venusia, attended by a very small number of halfarmed troops, and in such a condition as could not fail fail to excite compassion in good and faithful allies, BOOK and contempt in the faithless and proud, such as XXIII were the Campanians. And this contempt of him-felf, and of his fituation, the conful also increased B.C. ·by too unguardedly exposing and displaying the disaftrous state of his affairs. For, on the ambassador's telling him that the senate and people of Campania were much grieved that any misfortune should have happened to the Romans, and promising fupplies of every kind, towards carrying on the war, he answered, " Campanians, in desiring us to call " on you for supplies towards maintaining the war, 46 you have observed the usual manner of speaking " practifed between allies, rather than accommo-"dated your discourse to the present state of our 66 fortune. For what has been left us at Cannæ, " that, as if we had fomething of our own, we 66 should wish to have its deficiencies made up " by our allies? Should we call on you for infantiy, " as if we had cavalry? Should we tell you that we want money, as if that were the only thing " wanted? Fortune has left us nothing; not fo "much as a remnant to which additions might be " made. Our legions, our cavalry, arms, stand-" ards, men and horses, money, provisions, have all 66 perished, either in the field, or in the loss of the " two camps, on the following day. Wherefore, " Campanians, your part is, not to aid us in the war, 66 but, in a manner, to undertake the war in our 66 stead. Call to mind how, formerly, when your " forefathers were driven, in difmay, within the " walls, terrified at the approach of the armies of " their enemics, both Samnites and Sidicinians, we "took them under our protection, stood up in their "defendant Saticula; and this war against the Sam"nites a secretaken on your account, we maintained, " through various viciflitudes of fortune, during a " space of near one hundred years. Add to this " that, though we possessed the right of sovereignty

B.C. 216.

BOOK ", ever you, we granted you an all the on terms of equality; allowed you your own laws, and, in fine, what was to be confidered (at least sefore the defeat at Cannæ) as the highest honour in our "power to confer, we admitted a great number "among you to the freedom of our city, and shared " its privileges with you. For these reasons, Cam-" panians, you ought to confider our late delicat as a common mistortune, and to deem it your duty to " defend our common country. The dispute is 56 not with the Etrurian, or the Samnite; in which case the sovereignty, though taken from us, would " still remain in Italy; a Carthaginian foe draws " after him, from the remotest limits of the world, " from the streights of the ocean and the pillars of 66 Hercules, an host of men who are not even 66 natives of Africa, and who are utter strangers to " all laws, to all the rules and rights of fociety, and " almost to the language of men. This horde, " cruel and favage from nature and habit, their " leader has taken pains to render still more favage; " making them form bridges and ramparts of "human bodies heaped together, and, what is fhocking even to mention, teaching them to feed on human flesh. Who, that was but born in any ee part of Italy, could think, without horror and de-66 testation, of seeing, and acknowledging as sove-" reigns, fuch creatures as these, who live on fuch " abominable food, whose very touch would convey 66 pollution; of receiving laws from Africa and " Carthage, and of fuffering Italy to become a province to Moors and Numidians? It will be highly "honourable to you, Campanians, that the Roman empire, tottering under so severe a blow, should " be upheld and restored by your faithful real and " strength. I suppose that there may is issed in 66 Campania thirty thousand foot, and four thousand 66 horse. Of money and corn you already have " abundance. If your zeal in our favour be but equal to your abilities, neither shall Hannibal per BOOK ceive that he has been victorious, nor the Roman SKIII.

"that they have been defeated."

VI: After the conful had spoken thus, the ambaffadors were difmiffed; and, as they were returning home, one of them, whose name was Vibius Virius, observed to the rest, that the time had " now arrived, when the Campanians might bet " only recover from the Romans the lands of which "they had been unjustly deprived, but also gain " possession of the sovereignty of Italy. For they " might form an alliance with Hannibal, on whatever terms they themselves should choose; and 44 when Hannibal, after completing his fuccess, and 66 putting an end to the war, should depart into 46 Africa, and withdraw his army, the fovereign re power over Italy, without any dispute, would be " left in the possession of the Campanians." these sentiments of Vibius all the rest concurred. and they accordingly made fuch a report of the iffue of their embassy, as persuaded every one that the Roman power was utterly annihilated. beians, and the greater part of the fenate, began instantly to take measures for a revolt. by the earnest persu si ons of the elder citizens, their proceedings were deferred for a few days; but, at last, the opinion of the majority prevailed, that the fame ambaffadors, who had gone to the Roman conful, should be fent to Hannibal. In some histories, I have read, that, before this embassy was dispatched, or the defign of revolting finally determined upon, amhafladois were fent by the Campanians to Rome, regularing that, if the Roman people expected fuccions from them, they should elect one of the confusion of Campania; that this excited fo great indignation, that they were ordered to be turned out of the senate-house; and that a lictor was sent to conduct them out of the city, and to warn them to retire,

BOOK ness to see and to compliment the Carthaginian, XXIII. he walked carelessly in the Forum with his fon, Y.R. 536. and a few of his attendants. Hannibal, immedi-B.C. 216, ately on entering the city, demanded an audience of the senate; but the principal Campanians then befought him not, at that time, to attend to any ferious business, but, with chearfulness and freedom, to celebrate a day which his arrival had confecrated to festivity. Although furiously passionate, yet, unwilling to refuse them any thing on the commencement of their connection, he spent a great part of that day in taking a view of the city. He was lodged at the house of the two Minii Celeres, Stenius and Pacuvius, men highly distinguished by the nobility of their birth, and the greatness of their wealth. Hither Pacuvius Calavius, whom we mentioned before, the leader of that faction, whose violence had effected the present union, brought his fon, a young man, after having, with difficulty, drawn him away from the fide of Decius Magius: for the youth had joined him, with the warmest zeal, in supporting the Roman alliance, and opposing the treaty with the Carthaginians; nor had the public determination, on the other fide, or his respect for his father, been able to produce a change in his fentiments. Calavius, by entreaties rather than excuses, procured appardon for him, from Hannibal, who, overcome by the father's prayers and tears, even defired that he should be invited, together with his father, to supper, though he had intended to admit no Campanian to the entertainment, except his hosts, and Jubellius Taurea, a man celebrated for his abilities in war. The entertainment began early in the day, and the feast, as might be expected in a city remarkable for luxury, and in a house particularly so, was not conformable to the Carthaginian customs, or to military discipline, but furnished with every incentive to convivial enjoyment. Calavius's fon, Perolla, alone main-maintained a degree of referve, which neither the BOOK attentions of the mafters of the house, nor those XXIII. fometimes added by Hannibal himfelf could overcome. For this he apologized by imputing it to B.C. 216. indifposition, and his father alleged also the disturbed state of his mind, which could not then be wondered at. About fun-fet, the elder Calavius, going out of the room, was followed by his fon, who, when they came into a private place (a garden at the rear of the house), faid to him; Father, I have a plan to mention to you, by " which we may not only procure from the Romans " pardon of our misconduct, in going over to "Hannibal, but also acquire to the people of Cam-" pania, a much larger share of their esteem and " favour than we have ever yet enjoyed." father, with furprife, enquiring what fort of a plan this was, he threw back his gown from his shoulder, and shewed him a sword girt to his side, then said, "I will prefently, with Hannibal's blood, ratify 66 our alliance with Rome. Of this I thought it " proper to apprize you, because you may, per-" haps, wish to be absent, when the deed is " performed."

1X. On this fight, and hearing these words, the old man, distracted with apprehension, as if he were then present at the perpetrating of the act which had been mentioned, exclaimed; "By all the ties, " my fon, which unite children to their parents, I intreat, I befeech you, do not, before the eyes of " your father, commit a deed of fuch transcendant " horror, and draw on yourfelf extremity of ruin. "But few hours have elapsed, fince, swearing by all " the gods existing, and joining our right hands to " his, we bound ourselves to be faithful to him; " was it that immediately, on quitting the confer-" ence, we should arm against him those very hands, "which we had given as facred pledges of our

BOOK " faith? You are just risen from a hospitable table, XXIII. " to which, of only three Campanians favoured " with an invitation by Hannibal, you were one; Y.R.536. " was it that you should stain that very table with B.C.216. Was it that you mount in the blood of your host? My intreaties, as a father, " have prevailed over Hannibal's refentment in " favour of my fon; shall they have less power with " my fon in favour of Hannibal? But suppose there were no facred obligation in the case, no faith, no " religion, no filial duty, let the most abominable " deeds be perpetrated, if they do not, along with "the guilt, bring ruin on ourselves. Do you mean " to affault Hannibal with your fingle arm? What will that numerous crowd, both of freemen and " flaves, be doing? What the eyes of all, intent " on him alone? What fo many right hands? "Will they all be benumbed, during fuch a mad " attempt? How will you be able to support the " looks of Hannibal himself, which armed hosts are " unable to withstand; which the Roman people " behold with horror? Besides, will you be hardy enough to strike me, when, should other assistance " be wanting, I shall oppose my person to the dan-" ger in defence of Hannibal's? Now, be affured, " that, if you strike and pierce his body, it must " be through my breast. Suffer yourself, then, to 66 be diffuaded here, rather than overpowered there. " Let my prayers have as much weight with you, " as they had to-day with him in your behalf." Observing the youth now softened into tears, he threw his artns round him, and, embracing him, with kisses, persevered in his entreaties, until he prevailed on him to lay aside the sword, and give him his honour that he would make no fuch attempt. The fon then faid, "I, for my part, will pay to my father " the debt of duty which I owe to my country. " But I am grieved at the circumstances in which "you stand, who have to answer for the crime of having thrice betrayed your country; once, when "you advised the revolt from the Romans; a BOOK fecond time, when you promoted an alliance with MXIII. Hannibal; and a third time, this day, when you obstruct and prevent the re-union of Capua with Rome. Do thou, my country, receive this weapon, which I wished to use with essection, not through any tenderness to the enemy, but because my father extorts it from me." So saying, he threw the sword over the garden-wall into the street, and, to avoid suspicion, returned to the company.

X. Next day, Hannibal had audience in a full meeting of the senate, where the first part of his discourse contained nothing but expressions of affection and kindness; thanking the Campanians for having preferred his friendship to their former alliance; and, among other magnificent promises, assuring them, that Capua should, in a short time, be the metropolis of Italy; and that the Romans, as well as the other nations, should receive laws from it. He then took notice, that "there was one person who had " no title to a share in the friendship of the Car-"thaginians, and in the terms of the treaty now " concluded; who ought not to be confidered, " or even named, as a Campanian: this was Decius " Magius. Him he demanded to be delivered into " his custody, and required that the senate should, " in his presence, take Magius's conduct into con-" fideration, and determine concerning him." proposition was unanimously affented to, notwithstanding that a great part of the senate thought that he had not deserved such severe treatment; and, likewise, that this first step was no small encroachment on their independence. He then, leaving the fenate-house, placed himself on the judgment-feat of the chief magistrate, and gave orders that Decius Magius should be seized, brought to his feet, and there,

BOOK unsupported, stand his trial. The other, retaining XXIII. his undaunted spirit, insisted that, according to the Y.R. 536. terms of the treaty, he was not liable to fuch com-B.C. 216. pulsion; on which he was loaded with chains, and ordered to be led by a lictor into the camp. As long as he was conducted with his head uncovered, he continually harangued the multitude, which every where gathered round him, calling out to them -"You have now, Campanians, the independence "that you aimed at. In the middle of your "Forum, in the light of day, before your eyes, "I, who am inferior to no one of the Campanians, " am chained and dragged to execution." " more violent outrage could have happened, " were Capua taken by storm? Go out, then, to " meet Hannibal, decorate the city, consecrate the " day of his arrival, that you may behold fuch a " triumph as this over one of your own country-" men." While he was exclaiming in this manner, the populace appearing to be moved by his remonstrances, his head was covered, and an order given, that he should be dragged more speedily out of the gate. Being brought in this manner to the camp, he was instantly put on board a ship, and fent away for Carthage: for Hannibal was apprehenfive left, in confequence of the harsh treatment shewn him, some commotion might arise in the city, that even the fenate might repent of having given up one of their principal members, and that, should an embassy be sent to reclaim him, he must either, by refusing their first request, give offence to his new allies, or, if he complied, must expect to find him a constant fomenter of sedition and disturbance in Capua. A storm drove the ship to Cyrene, which was at that time under the dominion of the Egyptian Kings. Here Magius, having fled to the statue of King Ptolemy as a fanctuary, was carried under a guard to Alexandria, to Ptolemy; and having represented to him, that he had BOOK been put in chains by Hannibal, contrary to the XXIII. terms of the treaty, he was set at liberty, and re-Y.R.536. ceived permission to return either to Rome or B.C. 216. Capua, whichever he pleafed. Magius answered, that "at Capua he could not expect fafety; that his " residence at Rome, at that time, when war sub-" fifted between the Romans and Campanians, "would give him the appearance of a deferter, " rather than of a guest; and that there was no " place where he fo much wished to live, as in the " territory of the King, in whom he had found a " protector, and deliverer from bondage."

XI. During these transactions, Quintus Fabius Pictor, who had been fent ambaffador to Delphi, returned to Rome, and read, from a written copy, the answer which he had received. This contained instructions to what deities, and in what manner, fupplications should be made; and then proceeded thus: "Romans, if you follow these directions, your " affairs will improve and prosper; the business of " your state will advance more agreeably to your "wishes, and the Roman people will be finally "victorious in the war: when your commonwealth " shall be settled in safety and prosperity, then, out " of the acquifitions made by your arms, fend an " offering to the Pythian Apollo, and dedicate to " his honour a part of the booty, of the captives, " and of the spoils. Banish licentiousness from " among you." After repeating these words, translated from the Greek verses, he added, that "when " he retired from the oracle, he immediately per-" formed worship to all these divinities, with offer-" ings of wine and incense; and was ordered by the " chief priest of the temple, that as he had ap-" proached the oracle, and had performed worship "with a crown of laurel on his head, fo he should " go on board his ship, wearing the same crown, 1 3

BOOK " and not lay it aside until he should arrive at Rome. XXIII. "That he had, with the utmost diligence and re-

Y.R.536. " verence, executed all the commands given him, B.C. 216. "Apollo at Rome." The fenate then decreed that those supplications, and other acts of worship, should be performed as foon as possible.

> XII. While these things were passing in Rome and Italy, Mago, fon of Hamilcar, had arrived at Carthage with the news of the victory at Cannæ. He had not been dispatched by his brother immediately after the battle, but delayed for several days, in receiving the fubmissions of the cities of Bruttium which revolted. Being introduced to an audience of the fenate, he gave a full account of his brother's exploits in Italy; that "he had fought pitched bat-"tles with fix confular armies, and fix feveral com-" manders; of whom four were confuls, one dic-" tator, and the other master of the horse; had 66 flain above two hundred thousand of the enemy, " and had taken above fifty thousand. Of the four " confuls, he had flain two; one had escaped "wounded; and the other, with scarce fifty of his " men, after having loft the rest of his army. The " master of the horse, an officer of equal power with 46 a conful, had been defeated and driven off the " field; and the dictator, because he always cautiously " avoided an engagement, was esteemed as a com-" mander of fingular abilities. The Bruttians and "Apulians, with part of the Samnites and Lucanians, 46 had come over to the Carthaginians. Capua, which was the metropolis not only of Campania, but " fince the ruin of the Roman power in the battle " of Cannæ, of Italy, had been furrendered to him. " For these so great and so numerous successes, it " was proper that the public should be grateful, and " should offer thanksgivings to the immortal gods." Hernen, in confirmation of this joyful intelligence, ordered ordered the gold rings taken from the Romans to be BOOK poured down in the porch of the senate-house; and XXIII. of these there was so great a heap, that, according to Y.R.536. fome writers, on being measured, they filled three B.C. 216 pecks and a half; but the more general account, and likewise the more probable is, that they amounted to no more than one peck. He also explained to them, in order to show the greater extent of the flaughter, that none but those of equestrian rank, and of these only the principal, wore this ornament. The main purport of his discourse was, that "the " nearer their prospect was of finishing the war, the " more vigorous support, of every kind, ought to be " afforded to Hannibal; for that it was carried on at " a great distance from home, in the heart of the " enemy's country. The confumption of money " and corn was great; and fo many engagements, "while they ruined the Roman armies, had dimi-" nished, in some degree, those of the conqueror. " It was therefore necessary to send a reinforcement, " and likewise to send money for the pay, and corn " for the maintenance of the troops, who had me-" rited fo highly of the Carthaginian nation."

XIII. At the conclusion of Mago's discourse, while all were filled with joy, Himilco, one of the Barcine faction, thinking this a favourable opportunity for farcastic reflections on Hanno, said to him, "Hanno, what is your opinion now? Are you still "forry for our entering into the war against the "Romans? Advise now the delivering up Han-" nibal, oppose the offering thanks to the im-"mortal gods, on occasion of these happy events. 46 Let us hear a Roman fenator in the fenate-house " of the Carthaginians." To this Hanno replied; " Conscript Fathers, I should have remained filent " this day, left, in a time of general joy, I might " utter some expression tending to damp it. But now, called upon, as I am, by a member of this BOOK "body, to declare whether I am still forry for our XXIII. " having entered into the war against the Romans, " if I refuse to answer, I may incur the imputation Y.R.536. "either of superciliousness or servility; the former " indicating a want of due regard to the independ-" ent rights of others, the latter to a man's own. "Let me, therefore, answer Himilco, that I have " not ceased to lament the war; nor will I cease " to censure that invincible commander of yours, " until I shall see the war concluded on some tole-" rable terms; nor will any thing, except a new "treaty of peace, put an end to my regret for the loss of the old. Those matters, then, which "Mago just now so pompously blazoned out, afford present joy to Himilco, and the other " partifans of Hannibal. To me, too, they may " eventually prove matter of joy; because successes in war, if we are willing to make the proper " use of fortune's favours, will gain us a peace on "the more honourable terms. For should we " neglect to improve the prefent feafon, when we " can possibly dictate, instead of receiving proposi-"tions for the fame, even now our exultation may " lead us into delufive expectations, and prove, in "the end, destitute of folid advantage. For, let " us fee on what footing it stands at this moment. "I have cut off the armies of the enemy: fend " me foldiers. What elfe would you ask, if you 66 had been defeated? I have taken two camps, " full, doubtless, of booty and provisions: give me " money and corn. What other demand could you " make, if your stores had been plundered, if you " were beaten out of your camp? But that I may " not be the only person to perceive the unaccounttableness of those proceedings, I wish that either " Himilco or Mago would inform me (for fince I " have answered Himilco, it is but reasonable and " fair that I likewise, in turn, should ask a question), " at the fight at Cannæ has completed the ruin of " the "the Roman empire, and all Italy is evidently BOOK " coming over to our fide; in the first place, has XXIII. " any state of the Latine nation revolted to us? Y.R.536. "And next, has any one man, out of the thirty- B.C. 216. "five tribes, deferted?" To both these questions, Magó answering in the negative; "We have still, "then," faid he, "more than enough of enemies " remaining. But, be their number what it may, " I should be glad to know what degree of spirit or " of hope they posses?" The other declaring that he knew not that: "Nothing," faid he, " is easier " to be known. Have the Romans fent any am-" baffadors to Hannibal to treat of peace? Have " vou even received any intelligence of any mention " of it being made at Rome?" Both being denied, he proceeded: "Since that is the case, we have not " brought the war any nearer to a conclusion than "it was on the day when Hannibal first entered "Italy. Most of us are old enough to remember " how, often victory changed fides in the former "Punic war. At no time did our affairs wear a " more prosperous aspect, both by land and sea, " than just before the consulship of Caius Lutatius " and Aulus Postumius. In the consulship of Lutatius " and Postumius, we suffered a total overthrow at the " Ægatian islands. Now, if, in the course of for-" tune, our affairs should undergo any such altera-"tion, (may the gods avert the omen!) do you 66 hope, that, after we shall be vanquished, we may " obtain peace; whereas now, when we are victo-"rious, there is no one disposed to offer it? " my part, were it proposed, either to offer terms " of peace to the enemy, or to receive overtures " from them, I know what vote I should give. But " if the question before you be concerning the sup-" plies demanded by Mago, I do not fee any necef-" fity of fending them to troops already victorious: " much less can I vote for their being fent to men

BOOK " who delude us with false and groundless hopes." XXIII. But few were affected by this difcourse of Hanno; Y.R. 536. for his known enmity to the Barcine family detracted B.C. 216. from the weight of his arguments: and besides, men's minds were fo fully occupied by joy for the present success, that they were unwilling to listen to any thing which tended to invalidate the grounds of their triumph; and firmly believed, that, by a little farther exertion, the war would be fpeedily terminated. A decree of the fenate was therefore passed, by a very great majority, that a reinforcement should be fent to Hannibal of four thousand Numidians, and forty elephants, with many talents of filver. fame time the dictator was fent with Mago into Spain, to hire twenty thousand foot and four thousand horse, which were to complete the numbers of the armies both in Spain and Italy. However, this business, as is often the case in a time of prosperity, was not executed either with spirit or dispatch.

> XIV. The Romans, prompted by their natural activity of spirit, and also by the present situation of their affairs, omitted no kind of exertion. conful applied, with diligence, to every business which lay within his department; and the dictator, Marcus Junius Pera, after finishing all matters respecting religion, demanded, as usual, the leave of the people to mount his horse; and then, in addition to the two city legions, levied by the confuls in the beginning of the year, and a body of flaves whom he had enlifted, and the cohorts collected out of the Picenian and Gallic territories, he had recourse to an expedient used only in times of extreme danger, when propriety gives place to utility: he published a proclamation, that "fuch persons as had been " guilty of capital crimes, or had been ordered into " confinement on account of debt, should be dif-" charged from profecution, and from their debts, " provided

" provided they enlifted with him as foldiers:" thefe, BOOK amounting to fix thousand men, he armed with the XXIII. spoils of the Gauls, which had been carried in tri- Y R-536. umph by Caius Flaminius. By these means he was B.C. 216. enabled to fet out from the city at the head of twenty-five thousand effective men. Hannibal, after gaining possession of Capua, made a second trial of the temper of the Neapolitans, by applications both to their hopes and fears; but, being disappointed therein, he removed his army into the territory of Nola: where, though he did not immediately commence hostilities, because he did not despair of the people's voluntary fubmission, yet he shewed a determination, in case of their delaying compliance with his expectations, to make them feel every kind of evil. The fenate, and especially the leading members of it, faithfully adhered to the alliance with Rome; while the commons were, as usual, univerfally inclined to the party of Hannibal; fo great were their fears of the devastation of their lands, and on the heavy fufferings and indignities to be endured in a fiege; nor were leaders wanting to urge them to a revolt. The fenate, dreading lest, if they made open profession of their intentions. they should find it impossible to withstand the violent temper of the populace, concealed them under a counterfeit appearance, and thereby found means to defer the evil. They pretended that they approved the defign of revolting to Hannibal; but that they could not immediately determine on the conditions. on which it might be proper to contract this new alliance.. Having thus gained time, they hastily dispatched ambassadors to Claudius Marcellus, the Roman prætor, then at Casilinum with his army, informing him of the precarious fituation of the state of Nola; that the country was already posfessed by Hannibal, as the city would shortly be, unless it received succour: that the senate, by pretending, in compliance with the humour of the commons.

BOOK commons, that they were ready to change fides XXIII. whenever the latter chose, had hitherto allayed their Y.R.536. violent haste to revolt. Marcellus, after applauding B.C. 216. the conduct of the Nolans, charged them to protract the business under the same pretexts, until he should arrive; and to conceal in the mean-time what had passed between him and them, and every expectation of an affistance from the Romans. He himself advanced from Cafilinum to Calatia: and from thence. after croffing the river Vulturnus, he proceeded through the territories of Saticula and Trebia, and passing above Suessula, came through the mountains to Nola.

> XV. On the approach of the Roman prætor, the Carthaginian retired out of the territory of Nola, and marched down to the fea-coast adjacent to Neapolis, being earneftly defirous to get poffession of a fea-port town to which ships might come over with fafety from Africa. But having learned that Neapolis was held by a Roman general, Marcus Junius Silanus, who had been invited thither by the Neapolitans, he gave up all hopes of Neapolis, as well as of Nola, and directed his route to Nuceria. After carrying on the fiege of this town for a confiderable time, and making frequent attempts to reduce it by force, and also endeavouring in vain to gain over, fometimes the commons, at others the nobility, he at length starved it into a furrender; when he allowed the garrison no other terms than to retire without arms, and with fingle garments. Afterwards, as he had, from the beginning, wished to appear inclined to act with clemency towards all the Italians, except the Romans, he offered rewards and honours to fuch of the garrison as should stay and enlist with him: but he did not by these prospects prevail on one man to join him. They all departed, by different roads, to the feveral cities of Cam-

Campania, wherever each man's connections, or BOOK. casual impulse of inclination, directed him; but XXIIL most of them to Nola and Neapolis. About thirty Y.R.536. of the principal senators, having directed their course B.C.216. to Capua, and being refused admittance there, on account of their having shut their gates against Hanzibal, retired to Cumæ. The plunder of Nuceria was given to the foldiers, and the city, after being facked, was burned. Marcellus held possession of Nola; for the continuance of which he relied. not more on his own troops, than on the favourable disposition of the principal inhabitants. But strong apprehensions were entertained of the commons, and above all of Lucius Bantius: being conscious of having fomented the defign of a revolt, and dreading the refentment of the Roman prætor, he was stimulated, first, to betray his native city, and then, should that attempt miscarry, to go over to the He was a young man of an active spirit, and distinguished among the cavalry of the allies almost beyond every other: he had been found at Cannæ, half dead, among a heap of lifeless bodies, and Hannibal had, with much kindness, taken care of him, until he recovered, and even fent him home. loaded with presents. Out of gratitude for these favours, he now wished to bring the state of Nola under the power and dominion of the Carthaginians. It did not escape the observation of the prætor, that he was perplexed in mind, and anxiously employed in devising the means of effecting a revolution. However, as it was necessary either to check him by punishment, or to conciliate his good will by kind treatment, he judged it more prudent to attach to himfelf a brave and vigorous affociate, than merely to deprive the enemy of him: fending, therefore, for him, he observed, in a kind manner, that, he " must certainly be envied by many of his coun-66 trymen, as was easily known from this circum-" stance, that no citizen of Nola ever informed " him

BOOK " him of his many extraordinary exploits in war: XXIII. " but when any man ferved in a Roman camp, his " merit could not continue in obscurity. That Y.R.536. many of those, who had acted with him, however, had reported well of his conduct; how often, and to what great dangers, he had exposed " himself, in defence of the welfare and dignity of "the Roman people; particularly that, in the battle " of Cannæ, he had not cealed fighting, until, " being almost entirely exhausted, he was buried " under a heap of men, horses, and arms. Proceed, "therefore," faid he, "in your meritorious course; "from me you shall meet with every distinction, " every reward; in fine, and that you may give " me your company the oftener, you shall find "that fuch conduct, as it will redound to your "honour, fo shall it to your emolument too." While the young man was overjoyed at fuch promifes, he presented him with a horse of uncommon beauty, ordered the quæstor to give him five hundred filver denarii*, and commanded his lictors to admit him to his presence, whenever he chose to By this courteous behaviour of Marcellus, the violent temper of the youth was foothed to fuch a degree, that, from that time forward, no one among the allies exerted more bravery and zeal in support of the Roman cause.

XVI. As Hannibal was now at the gates, (for he had led his forces back from Nuceria to Nola,) and as the commons of the latter began anew to meditate a revolt, Marcellus retired within the walls; not that he was under any apprehension for the safety of his camp, but that he might not allow an opportunity of betraying the city, for which too many impatiently wished. From this time, it was the practice to draw up the forces on both sides in order of battle; the Romans, under the walls of Nola; the BOOK Carthaginians, before their own camp; in confe- XXIII. quence of which, many skirmishes happened between Y.R 536. the camp and the city, with various success; the B.C. 216. generals being unwilling either to restrain the small parties, who inconfiderately challenged the foe, or to give the fignal for a general engagement. While the two armies continued to post themselves in this manner, the men of the first rank in Nola gave information daily to Marcellus, that " con-" ferences were held by night between the com-"mons and the Carthaginians; wherein it had been "determined, that, when the Roman army went out of the gates on its march, the populace should " make plunder of their baggage and packages; "then shut the gates, and possess themselves of "the walls; with intent, that, having thus taken " into their own hands the disposal of their own " affairs, and of the city, they should give admit-" tance to the Carthaginians instead of the Romans." On receiving this intelligence, Marcellus, highly commending the Nolan fenators, refolved to try the fortune of a battle before any commotion should arise within. He then formed his forces in three divifions, at the three gates which faced the enemy, ordering the baggage to follow in the rear, and the invalids, fervants, and futler's boys to carry pali-At the gate in the centre, he placed the chief strength of the legions and the Roman cavalry; at the other two gates, on the right and left, the new-raifed foldiers, light infantry, and the cavalry of the allies. The Nolans were forbidden to come near the walls or gates; and the troops, intended as a referve, were appointed to guard the baggage, left any attack might be made on it, while the legions should be engaged. Marshalled in this manner, they stood within the gates. Hannibal, after standing as he had done for several days past, with his troops under arms and in order of battle, until

BOOK the day was far advanced, began to wonder, that

XXIII. neither the Roman army came out of the gates, nor Y.R. 536. One of their foldiers was to be feen on the walls. Concluding that the conferences had been difcovered, and that fear had rendered the Romans unwilling to ftir, he fent back part of his foldiers to the camp, with orders to bring up to the front with hafte, every thing requifite for affaulting the city; for he was perfuaded, that if he pressed them vigorously, while they declined action, the populace would rife in his favour. While his men in the van ran up and down, each intent upon the business assigned him, and the line drew nigh to the walls, Marcellus, on a fudden, throwing open the gate, ordered the charge to be founded, the shout to be raifed, and the infantry first, then the cavalry, to rush forth with all possible fury. These had now foread abundance of terror and confusion through the centre of the enemy's line, when from the two gates, on the right and left, the lieutenant-general Publius Valerius Flaccus, and Caius Aurelius, burft out against the wings. The servants, sutler's boys, and the whole of those who were left to guard the baggage, joined to increase the shout; so that to the Carthaginians, who had been led to despise them, chiefly by an opinion of the smallness of their numbers, they fuddenly exhibited an appearance of a very confiderable army. I can fcarcely indeed take upon me to affert, as some writers have done, that two thousand three hundred of the enemy were slain, and that the loss of the Romans was no more than five hundred: but, whether the advantage was fo great or not, the fuccess of that day was highly important; I know not, whether it was not the most fo of any obtained during that war: for, to avoid being conquered by Hannibal was, to the troops who were victorious on that day, a matter of greater difficulty than to conquer him afterwards.

XVII. Hannibal, thus precluded from all hope BOOK of getting possession of Nola, marched away to XXIII. Acerræ; and then Marcellus, immediately shutting Y.R.536. the gates, and posting guards to prevent any person B.C. 216. from going out of the city, held a judicial inquiry in the Forum concerning those who had entered into a private correspondence with the enemy. seventy were convicted of treasonable practices. These he beheaded, and adjudged their effects to be confiscated to the use of the Roman people; and then, having lodged the government in the hands of the senate, he marched thence with all his forces, and taking post above Suesfula, pitched his camp there. The Carthaginian first endeavoured to entice the people of Acerræ to a voluntary furrender, and afterwards, on finding them obstinate, prepared to invest and assault the town. However, the Acerrans possessed more courage than strength. When, therefore, they perceived the enemy drawing lines of circumvallation round their walls, despairing of being able to defend the city, they seized the opportunity, before the works were drawn completely round, and stealing away in the dead of night, through the space unoccupied by the lines, which was negligently guarded, effected their escape, some through the roads, others through pathless ways, as each was led by delign or mistake, into those cities of Campania, which they knew had not deferted the alliance with Rome. Hannibal, having facked and burned Acerra, and hearing that the Roman dictator, with his legions, were feen from Casilinum at some distance, began to apprehend, left, in confequence of the enemy being encamped in the neighbourhood, fome disturbance might arise even at Capua, and therefore led his forces to Casilinum. That town was held at this time by five hundred Prænestines, with a small number of Romans and Latines, whom the news of the disaster at Cannæ had brought thither.

The

BOOK The former, because the levies at Præneste were EXIII. not completed at the appointed day, had fet out from F.R. 536. home too late; and, having arrived at Casilinum B.C. 316. before the account of the defeat, and being there joined by feveral others, both Romans and allies, were marching forwards in a very confiderable body. when the news of the fight at Cannæ induced them to turn back. Here being feared by, and fearing the Campanians, they spent several days in guarding against plots, and forming them in turn; when, receiving certain information of the revolt intended at Capua, and of Hannibal's being received into the town, they put to death the obnoxious inhabitants by night, and feized on that part of the city which stands on this side of the Vulturnus, for it is divided by that river. And this was all the garrison the Romans had at Casilinum. To these was added a cohort of Perusians, consisting of four hundred and fixty men, driven hither by the fame bad news which had brought the Prænestines a few days before. The number of foldiers was now nearly sufficient for the defence of a place of fuch small extent, and which had one fide inclosed by the river. A scarcity of corn made them even think the number of men too great.

> XVIII. When Hannibal came within a fmall distance of the place, he sent forward a body of Gatulians, under an officer named Isalca, with orders, that if an opportunity could be found of conferring with the garrison, he should first endeavour to allure them, by expressions of kindness, to open the gates and receive his troops; but, if they perfifted in obstinate opposition, that he should then put his forces in action, and try if he could on any fide break into the city. When they came near the walls, all being filent, it was believed that the town was evacuated, and the barbarian, supposing that the garrison had retired through fear, was preparing to break down the gates; but these flying suddenly open, two co- BOOK horts, drawn up within for the purpole, rushed out XXIII. with great impetuofity, and made a confiderable Y.R. 536. flaughter. The first body of assailants being thus B.C. 216. repulfed. Maharbal was fent up with a more powerful force; but neither could he withstand the sally of the cohorts. At last, Hannibal, pitching his camp close under the walls, prepared to affault this fmall town and garrison with the whole of his troops: completely encompassing it, and while urging on the attack with briskness in every part at once, he lost a great number of his foldiers, particularly of those who were most forward in action, by weapons thrown from the walls and towers. At one time, the befieged having had the courage to fally out, Hannibal, by placing a line of elephants in their way, was very near cutting off their retreat. He drove them, however, in confusion into the town, after they had lost a great many men in proportion to the smallness of their number; and more would have fallen, had not night put an end to the engagement. following day, the befiegers were animated with extraordinary ardour to carry on the affault, especially as a mural crown of gold was proposed as a prize, and as the general himself upbraided the conquerors of Saguntum with their tardy advances in the fiege of a trifling fortress, situate on level ground; reminding each in particular, as well as the whole army in general, of Trebia, Trasimenus, and Canna. They then began to work their machines, and to fink mines; nor were those allies of the Romans deficient either in vigour or skill, to counteract the attempts of the enemy. Against the machines they erected bulwarks, by countermines intercepted the mines, baffling all the efforts of the Carthaginians both open and concealed, until even shame compelled him to abandon the enterprize: but, left he should appear to have entirely given up the defign,

BOOK he fortified a camp, where he posted a small body of XXIII. troops, and then withdrew into winter-quarters at Capua. Here, during the greater part of the winter, Y.R 536. Le kept his forces lodged in houses, men who had frequently and long endured with firmness every hardship to which human nature is liable; and had never been accustomed to, nor ever had experienced the comforts of prosperity. These men, therefore, whom no power of advertity had been able to fubdue, were ruined by an excess of good fortune and by immoderate pleasures. These produced effects the more pernicious; because, being hitherto unaccustomed, as I have said, to such indulgences, they plunged into them with the greater avidity. Sleep, and wine, and feafting, and harlots, and baths, and idleness, with which, through habit, they became daily more and more delighted, enervated both their minds and bodies to fuch a degree, that they owed their preservation, rather to the name they had acquired by their past victories, than to their present strength. In the opinion of persons skilled in the art of war, the general was guilty of a greater fault in this instance, than in not leading forward his army directly to the city of Rome, after the battle of Cannæ: for that dilatory conduct might be supposed only to have deferred the conquest for a time, whereas this latter error left him destitute of the strength to effect it. Accordingly he marched out of Capua as if with a different army, for it retained not, in any particular, the least remains of the former discipline. Most of the men returned to the field encumbered with harlots; and, as foon as they began to live in tents, and were obliged to undergo the fatigue of marches, and other military labours; like raw recruits, their strength both of body and mind failed them: and from that time, during the whole course of the summer campaign, great numbers used to steal away from their standards, without without leave, and the only lurking place of all these BOOK deferters was Capua.

Y.R.536.

XIX. However, when the rigour of the feafon B.C.216. began to abate, he drew his troops out of their winter-quarters, and returned to Cafilinum; where, notwithstanding there had been a cessation from attacks, yet the continued blockade had reduced the townsmen and garrison to the extremity of want. The Roman camp was commanded by Titus Sempronius, the dictator having gone to Rome to take the auspices anew. Marcellus, who, on his part, earnestly wished to bring relief to the besieged, was prevented by the overflowing of the river Vulturnus, and by the earnest intreaties of the people of Nola and Acerrae, who dreaded the Campanians, in case of the departure of the Roman troops. Gracchus, having received injunctions from the dictator not to engage in any enterprize during his absence, but to maintain his post near Casilinum, did not venture to flir, although he received fuch accounts from that town, as were fufficient to overcome every degree of patience. It appeared that feveral, unable longer to endure hunger, had thrown themselves down precipices, and that others stood unarmed on the walls, exposing their naked bodies to the blows of the missive weapons. Gracchus felt great concern for their distresses; but he neither dared to engage in fight, contrary to the dictator's order, (and fight he plainly must, if he attempted openly to throw in provisions,) nor had he any hope of getting them conveyed in clandestinely by his men. He therefore collected corn from all parts of the country round; and having filled therewith a great number of casks, sent a messenger to Casilinum to the magistrate, defiring that the people should catch the casks which the river would bring down. The following night was passed in attentively watching for the completion of the hopes raifed by the Roman messenger,

BOOK when the casks, being fent along the middle of the XXIII. ftream, floated down to the town, and the corn was Y.R.536. The fame ftrata-B.C.216. gem was practifed with success on the following night, and on the third. The casks were put into the river, and conveyed to the place of their destination in the course of the same night, by which means they escaped the notice of the enemy's guards: but the river being afterwards rendered more rapid by continued rains, a whirling eddy drove them across to the side where the enemy's guards were posted, and there they were discovered flicking among ofiers which grew on the banks. This being reported to Hannibal, care was taken for the future to guard the Vulturnus with greater vigilance, fo that no supply, sent down by it to the city, should pass without discovery. Notwithstanding which, quantities of nuts being poured into the river at the Roman camp, and floating down in the middle of the stream to Casilinum, were stopped there with hurdles. The scarcity, however, at last became so excessive, that tearing off the straps and the leathern covers of their shields, and softening them in boiling water, they endeavoured to chew them, nor did they abstain from mice or any other kind of animal. They even dug up every fort of herb and root that grew at the foot of the ramparts of the town, and when the enemy had ploughed up all the ground round the wall, that produced any herbs, they fowed it with turnip feed, which made Hannibal exclaim, "Am I to fit here before Cafili-" num until these grow?" Although he had hitherto refused to listen to any terms of capitulation, yet he now allowed overtures to be made to him, respecting the redeeming of the men of free condition. agreement was made, that for each of these a ransom should be paid of seven ounces of gold; and then, having received the ratification of the same, the garrison furrendered. They were detained in custody until all 5

all the gold was paid, and afterwards honourably BOOK escorted to Cumæ. This is a more probable account XXIII. than that which relates that they were flain by a Y.R. 536. body of cavalry, ordered to attack them on their B.C. 216. departure. The greatest part of them were Prænestines; out of five hundred and feventy of these, (the number who were in the garrison,) almost one half perished by the sword or by famine, the rest returned in fafety to Præneste with their commander Manicius, who had formerly been a notary there. The truth of this relation is attested by a statue of him erected in the Forum at Præneste, clad in a coat of mail, and dreffed in a gown, with the head covered; and by three images, with an inscription engraved on a plate of brass, importing that "Mani-" cius vowed these in behalf of the soldiers, who "were in the garrison at Casilinum." The same inscription was placed under the three images in the temple of Fortune.

XX. The town of Cafilinum was restored to the Campanians, and strengthened by a reinforcement of feven hundred men from Hannibal's army, left, on the departure of the Carthaginian, the Romans should attack it. To the Prænestine soldiers, the Roman fenate decreed two years' pay, and immunity from military service for five years. Being offered the rights of Roman citizens, in consideration of their bravery, they chose to remain in their own community. With regard to the fate of the Perufians, our information is not fo clear; for we receive no light either from any monument of their own, or any decree of the Romans. About the same time, the Petellians, who alone of all the Bruttians had persevered in maintaining friendship with Rome, were attacked not only by the Carthaginians, who were in possession of the adjacent country, but also by the other Bruttians, who refented their following separate counsels. Unable to withstand such a multi-

BOOK tude of foes, the Petellians fent ambassadors to XXIII. Rome to folicit fuccour. The utmost compassion was excited in the breasts both of the senate and B.C. 216. people by these men's prayers and tears; for on being told that they must depend on themselves for fafety, they burst out into piteous lamentations in the porch of the senate-house. The affair being proposed a second time to the consideration of the fenators, by Manius Pomponius the prætor, after examining into the resources of the commonwealth in every quarter, they were obliged to acknowledge that they were not now in a capacity of affifting their distant allies; they therefore defired the ambaffadors to return home, and after doing their utmost to fulfil the duty of faithful confederates, to provide for their own fafety in the best manner the present circumstances would permit. the refult of this embaffy was reported to the Petellians, their fenate was fuddenly feized with fuch grief and terror, that many of them advised to abandon the city, and feek refuge wherever each could find it; others, that fince they were forfaken by their old connections, they should unite with the rest of the Bruttians, and through their mediation furrender themselves to Hannibal. However, the majority were of opinion that no step should be taken rashly, or in a hurry; but that the matter should be considered anew. Accordingly it was taken under deliberation on the following day, when their fears had in some measure subsided, the more confiderable perfons prevailing on them to bring in all their effects from the country, and to fortify the walls and the city.

> XXI. About this time letters were brought to Rome from Sicily and Sardinia. Those written from Sicily by Titus Otacilius, pro-prætor, were first read in the senate; the contents were, that "Publius Furius, the prætor, had come from

"Africa to Lilybæum with his fleet, and that he BOOK "himself was grievously wounded, so that his life XXIII. " was in imminent danger; that neither pay nor Y.R.536. corn was furnished to the foldiers and marines at B.C. 216. 46 the regular times, nor were there any funds from " which they could be obtained; that he earnestly " recommended that supplies of these articles might 66 be fent as foon as possible, and also, that, if it " feemed proper, one of the new prætors might be es appointed to succeed him in his employment." The letters of Aulus Cornelius Mammula, pro-prætor, from Sardinia, were nearly of the fame purport respecting hay and corn. To both the same answer was given, that there were no means of forwarding fupplies, and that they themselves must take measures for providing for their fleets and armies. Titus Otacilius, however, fending ambassadors to Hiero, the only resource of the Roman people in that quarter, received from him as much money as was necessary for the pay of the troops, and corn sufficient for fix months. In Sardinia, the allied states gave a liberal contribution to Cornelius. At Rome there was fuch a fcarcity of money, that it was judged requifite, on a proposal made to that purpose, by Marcus Minucius, plebeian tribune, to constitute three public bankers; these were Lucius Æmilius Papus, who had been conful and cenfor, Marcus Atilius Regulus, who had been twice conful, and Lucius Scribonius Libo, who was then plebeian tribune. Atilii, Marcus and Caius, being appointed commiffioners for the purpose, dedicated the temple of Corcord, which Lucius Manlius had vowed in his prætorship. Three pontiffs were also elected, Quintus Cæcilius Metellus, Quintus Fabius Maximus, and Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, in the room of Publius Scantinius, deceased, and of Lucius Æmilius Paullus, the conful, and Quintus Ælius Pætus, who had fallen in the battle of Cannæ.

BOOK

XXII. When the senate had repaired, as far as XXIII. could be effected by human wisdom, the losses suftained by other parts of the state, through the unin-B.C. 216. terrupted course of disasters in which fortune had involved them, they at length turned their thoughts on themselves, on the solitude that appeared in the fenate-house, and the small number of those who affembled in the great council of the nation: for the council had not been filled up fince the cenforship of Lucius Æmilius and Caius Flaminius, although, during these five years, the unfortunate battles, befides the casualties to which every man is subject, had fwept off fuch a number of its members. the dictator was now gone, after the loss of Casilinum, to join the army, this business was, at the earnest request of all, proposed to the consideration of the fenate by Manius Pomponius, a prætor. On which Spurius Carvilius, after having, in a long speech, lamented not only the fewness, but even the total want of citizens, who might be chosen into their body, faid, that " for the purpose of filling up the " fenate, and of forming a closer connection with the Latine nation, he recommended, with all the 66 earnestness which a matter of that importance "demanded, that, if the Roman fathers thought " proper so to order, two senators out of each of the Latine states should be invested with the rights of citizens, and adopted in the room of the mem-" bers deceased." This proposition the senators heard with no less disgust than had been excited by a demand of the same purport, formerly made by the Latines themselves. A murmur of indignation, indeed, fpread through every part of the affembly, Titus Manlius in particular, faying, that " there still existed one " of the same race with that conful, who formerly " declared in the Capitol, that he would with his own hand put to death any Latine whom he should " fee in the senate-house." Quintus Fabius Maximus faid, faid, that " never was the mention of any business BOOK in that house more perfectly unseasonable than XXIII. was (when the minds of the allies were in fuf-pense, and their fidelity doubtful,) the touching B.C. 216. . on a subject which might create farther disquiet 44 among them. That all present were bound to bury in universal forgetfulness those inconsiderate "words of one individual; for that if ever any " matter occurred in that house that demanded " fecrecy, and induced a folemn obligation to filence, " it was this proposition, which, beyond every other, ought to be covered, concealed, and configned 66 to oblivion, and to pass as if it never had been " uttered." This prevented any farther discussion. They then came to a resolution, that a dictator should be created, to elect members into the senate; and that he should be a person who had formerly been cenfor, and was the first in seniority living, of those who had held that office. They likewise ordered, that the conful Caius Terentius should be fent for, in order to nominate the dictator. Leaving his troops in Apulia, he came thence by long journies to Rome, and purfuant to the decree of the fenate, on the following night, according to the cultom, nominated Marcus Fabius Buteo dictator, for fix months, without a master of the borfe.

XXIII. Buteo mounted the rostrum, attended by his lictors, and declared, that " he did not approve 46 of two dictators at one time, of which there had 66 hitherto been no precedent; neither was he content with his own appointment to the dictatorship, ", without a master of the horse; nor of the censorial " power being intrusted to a fingle person, and to "that person a second time: nor yet of authority " being granted to a dictator for fix months, unless 66 he were to command in war. But those par-" ticulars,

BOOK On the road through which he was to lead his XXIII. army, there was a wood of vast extent, the Gauls called it Litana: the trees of this wood, adjoining B.C. 216. the road on the right and left, the Gauls had cut in fuch a manner, that as long as they were untouched they stood, but on being pushed, even with the slightest force, they fell. Postumius had with him two Roman legions, and had enlifted fuch numbers from among the allies on the coast of the upper sea, that he led an army of twenty-five thoufand men into the enemy's country. The Gauls posted themselves round the outer skirts of the wood. and, when the army on its march entered the pass. they then pushed the outermost trees of those which they had cut; these fell against the next, and those likewise against others unsteady before, until, over whelming the Romans on all fides, they crushed in one universal ruin, men, horses, and arms; so that scarcely ten of them made their escape; the greater part were bruifed to death by the trunks of the trees, or entangled in the fragments of branches, while the remainder, difmayed by this fudden and strange disaster, were slain by the Gauls. who, in arms, enclosed every part of the wood. Out of so great a number, a very few were taken prisoners; these pushing for a bridge which lay over a river, were intercepted by the enemy, who had taken possession of it before. Here Postumius fell, fighting with the utmost bravery to avoid being taken. This general's head the Boians cut off, and, together with the spoils taken from his body, carried it in triumph into a temple, which they held in the highest reverence. Asierwards emptying the head, as their custom is, they enchased the skull with gold, and this they used as a confecrated veffel, out of which they made libations on high festivals; and as a cup to be drank out of by the officiating priest, and the other priests of the place. The booty also, which fell into the hands of the Gauls, was as abundant, BOOK as their victory was complete: for although hardly XXIII. any escaped destruction from the falling of the Y.R.536. wood, yet every thing else was found spread re- B.C. 216. gularly along the line of the lifeless troops; because there had been no flight, and consequently no removal of any thing.

XXV. On the news of this calamity, fuch difmay possessed the public during several days, that the shops were shut, and solitude, like that of midnight, prevailed through the whole city, until the government charged the ædiles to go round through all the streets, to order the shops to be opened, and this appearance of public mourning to be laid aside. Then Tiberius Sempronius, affembling the fenate, endeavoured to confole them by faying, that "they " who had not funk under the ruinous disaster at " Cannæ, should not let their courage be depressed "by misfortunes of less moment." He observed, th t "provided their operations against Hannibal, " and their Carthaginian enemies, were attended with " fuccess, (as he hoped they would,) the profecution " of the war against the Gauls might, without "danger, be fulpended; and that it would be " always in the power of the gods and of the "Roman people to take ample vengeance for their "treachery. It was their business, therefore, to " confult and deliberate on the measures to be taken " against the Carthaginian, and on the strength "with which that war was to be conducted." He gave them a detail of the numbers of infantry and cavaliv, of Romans, and of allies, in the dictator's army: then Marcellus laid before them the amount of his own troops, while enquiry was made as to the force in Apulia, with the conful Caius Terentius. But no plan could be devised, of forming consular armies sufficiently powerful to cope with such formidable BOOK midable enemies. Wherefore, though strongly sti-XXIII. mulated by just refentment, they determined to suf-Y.R. 536. pend all proceedings against Gaul for that year. B.C. 216. The dictator's army was decreed to the conful. It was resolved that those soldiers in Marcellus's army, who had fled from Cannæ, should be transported into Sicily, and ferve there as long as the war should continue in Italy; and that to the same place should be fent the least able in the dictator's legions, but there was no order that these should be detained during any particular term, but only for the number of campaigns directed by law. The two city legions were affigned to the other conful, who should be substituted in the room of Lucius Postumius; who, it was determined, should be elected as foon as it could be done with permission of the auspices: that two legions should be brought home, with all expedition, from Sicily; out of which, the conful appointed to the charge of those of the city, should take as many soldiers as should be necessary: that the conful Caius Terentius should be continued in command for a year, and that no diminution should be made in the force employed under him for the defence of Apulia.

> XXVI. During the period in which those events took place, and these preparations were making in Italy, the war was profecuted with no less vigour in Spain, but success had hitherto inclined to the Romans. The two Scipios, Publius and Cneius, divided the forces between them, that Cneius might conduct the operations on land, and Publius those at fea; while Hasdrubal, who commanded the Carthaginians, having little confidence in any strength that he could muster against either, kept aloof, relying for safety on the distance and on the nature of the ground, until, after long and frequent folicitations, a reinforcement was fent him from Africa, of four thousand foot BOOK and five hundred horse. At length resuming hopes, XXIII. he removed his camp nearer to the enemy, and gave orders, in person, for preparing and fitting B.G. 216. out a fleet, for the protection of the islands, and the fea-coast. In the midst of the hurry of his preparations for recommencing the war anew, he was greatly alarmed by the defertion of the commanders of his ships, who, having been severely reprimanded for abandoning the fleet at the Iberus, in a cowardly manner, had never fince been very faithfully disposed, either to the general, or the interest of the Carthaginians. Thefe deferters had excited an infurrection in the country of the Tartessians, where, at their instigation, several cities had revolted, and one they had even taken by florm. Inflead, therefore, of directing his operations against the Romans, he turned them against his own nation; and, having entered their territory in an hostile manner, resolved to attack Galbus, a general of high reputation, commander of that people, who, with a powerful force, kept clofe within his camp, under the walls of the city, which had been taken a few days before. Accordingly, fending forward his light-armed troops to draw out the revolters to battle, he dispatched part of his infantry to ravage the lands, on all fides, and pick up stragglers: thus, at the same time, the camp was alarmed, and the country filled with flight and flaughter. At length, when, by different roads, the fugitives had escaped within their works, they fo entirely got rid of their panic, that they had courage fufficient, not only to defend them, but even to challenge Hafdrubal to battle. fallied out therefore in a body from the camp, dancing according to their custom; and their unexpected boldness struck terror into those who, a little before, took pains to provoke them. Hasdrubal, therefore, drew back his forces to an eminence

BOOK of confiderable height, and farther fecured by a XXIII. river running at the foot of it, ordering the advanced party of light troops, and the scattered horsemen. to B.C.216. retreat to the same place; but still not thinking himfelf fufficiently fecured by the hill or the river, he fortified his camp completely with a rampart. While they thus terrified each other alternately, feveral skirmishes took place, in which the Numidian cavalry proved not a match for the Spanish, nor the Mauritanian javelin bearer for the targeteer; the latter possessing, together with equal activity, much greater strength and much more courage.

> XXVII. The Tartessians, finding that they could not, by advancing to his camp, entice the Carthaginian to an engagement; and that, on the other hand, an affault on it would be attended with much difficulty, stormed the city of Asena, where Hasdrubal, on entering their territory, had stored up his corn and other provisions: and this gave them the command of all the adjacent country. And now they could no longer, either on a march, or in a camp, be kept in order by any command. As foon, therefore, as Hafdrubal perceived that success had, as usual, begotten such disorder, he exhorted his men to attack them while they straggled without their standards; and descending from the hill, proceeded, in order of battle, towards their camp. His approach being announced by messengers, slying back in consternation from the watch poils and advanced guards, the general alarm was given; on which, as fast as each could take up his arms, without command, without fignal, without regard to any regular dispofition, or even to ranks, they rushed out to battle. The foremost had already engaged in fight, while fome ran up, in fmall parties, and others had not yet come out of the camp. However, at the beginning.

beginning, merely through their daring boldness, BOOK they struck terror into the Carthaginians; but XXIII. afterwards, as their thin ranks closed with the compact bands of these, the danger, from the smallness B.C. 216. of their numbers, becoming apparent, each began to look about for support, and, being repulsed in all parts, they collected themselves in a circle. Here, crowding together, they were driven into fuch a narrow compass, that they had scarcely room to move their arms, and, in this fituation, were entirely furrounded, fo that the flaughter of them continued through the greater part of the day. small number, having forced a passage, made off to the woods and mountains; with like consternation, the camp was abandoned, and the whole nation, the day following, submitted to the conqueror. But it did not continue long in a state of peace: for orders were brought at feveral times from Carthage that Hasdrubal should, with all speed, lead his army into Italy. The report of this intended procedure, fpreading through Spain, wrought a change in the disposition of almost every state, in favour of the Hasdrubal, therefore, immediately dispatched a letter to Carthage, representing what mischief the faid report of his departure had occasioned. That "if he were really to remove thence, the "Romans would be masters of Spain, before he " should cross the Iberus. For, besides, that he " had neither forces, nor commander, whom he " could leave in his place, the Roman generals "were fuch, that, with strength equal to theirs, it " was scarcely possible to withstand them; where-" fore, if they had any regard for the country in " question, they ought to fend a successor in his " room, with a powerful army; who, though all events should prove prosperous, would find in the " province but little time for repose."

BOOK XXIII. Y.R. 536.

XXVIII. Although this letter made a confiderable impression on the senate, yet, deeming Italy of superior importance, and entitled to the first atten-B.C. 216. tion, they made no change in the orders respecting Haldrubal and his forces. Himilco was fent with a complete army and an extraordinary number of ships, in order to maintain a superiority in Spain, both by land and sea, and to defend it from all attacks. After transporting his land and sea forces, he fortified a camp, drew up the ships on land, and furrounded them with a rampart; and then, attended by a body of chosen horsemen, with all possible expedition, and with the same precautions in passing through nations whose attachment was doubtful, as through those who were professed enemies, he came to Hafdrubal. As foon as he had communicated to him the decrees and orders of the fenate, and learned from him, in turn, the method in which the war in Spain was to be conducted, he returned without delay to his own camp, being indebted for fafety to the celerity of his motions; for, before a plot could be concerted, any where, against him, he had always left the place. Hasdrubal, previously to his march, imposed contributions on all the states under his authority; for he well knew that Hannibal had, on feveral occasions, purchased a passage; that no confideration, but that of pay, made his Gallic auxiliaries remain with him; and that, if he had undertaken fuch an expedition, unprovided with money, he could scarcely have penetrated so far as to the Alps. Having therefore, with violent hafte, exacted the same, he marched down to the Iberus. When the Romans were informed of the decrees of the Carthaginians, and of Hasdrubal's movement, the two commanders, renouncing every other business, determined with their united forces to obstruct and put a stop to his enterprize. For they considered, that, if Hannibal, whose single force Italy could hardly hardly withstand, should be joined by the Spanish BOOK army with Hasdrubal at its head, there would be an end of the Roman empire. Anxiously intent on Y.R. 536. effecting this purpose, they made a junction of their B.C. 216. forces on the bank of the Iberus, and, croffing the river, held a long confultation whether they should directly face the enemy, or be content with detaining him, by attacking his allies. The refult was, that they determined to lay fiege to the city called Ibera, from the river near which it stood, at that time the most opulent in all that part of the country. When Hafdrubal understood this, instead of bringing succour to his allies, he likewise proceeded to besiege a town, lately put under the protection of the Romans: in consequence of which, the siege already formed by the latter was raifed, and their force directed against Hasdrubal himself.

XXIX. For a few days, they remained encamped at the distance, from each other, of five miles, not without skirmishes, but neither party offering battle. At length, on one and the fame day, both, as if by concert, displayed the fignal for fighting, and brought their whole force into the The Romans were formed in three lines: one half of the light troops were posted among the battalions in the front, the other half were tent back to the rear; the cavalry covered the wings. drubal compoled the centre of his line of Spaniards; on the right wing, he posted his Carthaginians; on the left, the Africans and hired auxiliaries; his cavalry he placed on the wings, annexing the Namidians to the Carthaginian infantry, the others to the However, all the Numidians were not placed on the right wing, but those only, whose practice it was, to bring two horses each into the field, and often in the very hottest of the fight to fpring, notwithstanding the weight of their armour,

from

BOOK from the wearied horse upon the fresh one, like those XXIII. who exhibit feats of activity as a show; so great is Y.R. 536. the agility of the men, and so docile their breed of B.C. 216. horses. While they stood, ranged in this manner, the hopes entertained by the commanders were pretty nearly equal on both fides: for neither one party nor the other had any great advantage, either in the number, or qualifications of their men. fentiments of the foldiery were widely different: for the Romans had been eafily brought by their commanders to believe, that though they fought at a great distance from their country, yet their efforts were to decide the fate of Italy, and of the city of Rome. Therefore, as their return to their native foil depended on the iffue of that battle, they had come to a determined resolution, either to conquer or die. The men who composed the opposite army were not possessed of such inflexible firmness; for the greatest part of them were Spaniards, who wished rather to be defeated in Spain, than, after gaining the victory, to be dragged into Italy. No fooner therefore was the first onset made, than almost, before the javelins were thrown, the centre of their line began to give way; and, on being vigorously pressed by the Romans, turned their backs. the wings, however, the fight was maintained with spirit; the Carthaginians on the one, and the Africans on the other, charging with briskness, and, as they had their enemy in a manner inclosed between them, attacking them on both fides. But as foon as the whole of the Roman troops had once come together into the centre, its strength was sufficient to compel the wings to retire in opposite directions. Thus there were two distinct battles; and, in both, the Romans, who, after the defeat of the enemy's centre, had the superiority both in the number and strength of their men, were completely victorious. In this engagement, vast numbers of the enemy were flain; and, had not the Spaniards fled fo pre- BOOK * cipitately before the battle was well begun, very few of XXIII. their whole army would have furvived. The cavalry Y.R.536. had no share in the engagement: for, as soon as the B.C. 216. Moors and Numidians faw the centre giving way, they instantly betook themselves to a precipitate slight, leaving the wings uncovered, and driving the elephants before them. Haldrubal, after staying until the fortune of the day was finally decided, made his escape from the midst of the carnage, accompanied by a few. His camp was taken and plundered by the Romans. If the inclinations of any people in Spain were hitherto doubtful, this battle fixed them in the interest of the Romans, and deprived Hafdrubal of every hope, not only of leading an army into Italy, but even of remaining in Spain with any degree of fafety. These events being made known at Rome, by letters from the Scipios, caused universal rejoicing, not so much in confideration of the victory itself, as of Hasdrubal's being thereby prevented from bringing his army into Italy.

XXX. While affairs in Spain proceeded in this manner, the city of Petellia in Bruttium was, after a fiege of feveral months, taken by Himilco, an officer of Hannibal's. This conquest cost the Carthaginians abundance of blood; but it was not force, fo much as famine, that overcame the befieged: for, after having confumed all kinds of eatable fruits, and the flesh of every kind of four-footed beast, they lived at last on the leather of their shields, on herbs and roots, and the tender bark of trees, with berries gathered from the brambles. Nor were they prevailed on to furrender, until their strength was fo entirely exhausted, that they were unable to stand on the walls, or to carry their arms. getting possession of Petellia, the Carthaginian led his forces against Confentia, which was not defended with equal obstinacy, but capitulated in a few days.

BOOK About the same time, an army of Bruttians invested XXIII. Croton, a Greek city, formerly powerful in men Y.R 536 and arms, but now reduced fo low, by many and BC.216. heavy misfortunes, that the number of its citizens of every age amounted to not quite twenty thousand. The place, therefore, being destitute of men for its defence, was eafily mastered. The citadel alone held out, into which, during the confusion confequent to the storming of the city, and while the other inhabitants were put to the fword, fome had made their escape. The Locrians too revolted to the Bruttians and Carthaginians, through the treachery of the nobles, who betrayed the popu-The Rhegians alone, in all that tract, maintained to the last their alliance with Rome, and their own independence. The fame disposition to change spread also into Sicily, and even the family of Hiero was not entirely uninfected with the spirit of revolt: for Gelo, his eldest fon, having conceived a contempt of his father's declining age, and also, fince the defeat at Cannæ, of the Roman connexion, joined the Carthaginians, and would have caused much disturbance in Sicily, had not a death so seasonable, that it threw some stain of suspicion even on his father, carried him off, while he was bufy in arming the populace, and courting alliances. Such were the transactions of this year, prosperous and otherwife in Italy, Africa, Sicily, and Spain. the close of the year, Quintus Fabius Maximus demanded of the fenate, that he might be allowed to dedicate the temple of Venus Erycina, which he had vowed in his dictatorship; and the senate decreed, that Tiberius Sempronius, conful elect, should, as foon as he entered into office, propose to the people the creation of Quintus Fabius, duumvir, for performing the dedication of that temple. In honour of Marcus Æmilius Lepidus, who had been twice conful, and an augur, his three fons, Lucius, Marcus, and Quintus, celebrated funeral games, which lasted lasted three days; in the course of which, they BOOK exhibited, in the Forum, twenty-two pairs of gla- XXIII. diators. The curule ædiles, Caius Lætorius and Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, consul elect, who, B.C. 316. during his ædileship, had likewise been master of the horse, performed the Roman games, which were also repeated during three days. The plebeian games of the ædiles, Marcus Aurelius Cotta and Marcus Claudius Marcellus, were thrice repeated. At the conclusion of this third year of the Punic Y. Rear. war, Tiberius Sempronius, consul, assumed the ad- B.C. 215. ministration of his office on the ides of March. Of the prætors, Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, who had formerly been twice conful, and likewife cenfor, held the city jurisdiction, and Marcus Valerius Lævinus that respecting foreigners. The lots gave to Appius Claudius Pulcher the province of Sicily; to Quintus Mucius Scævola that of Sardinia. The people ordained, that Marcus Marcellus should have authority as proconful, in confideration of his being the only one of the Roman commanders, who, fince the difafter at Cannæ, had fought with fuccefs.

XXXI. The fenate, on the first day of their meeting upon business in the Capitol, passed a decree, that double taxes should be imposed for that year, of which, one half should be levied without delay, for the purpose of giving immediate pay to all the troops, excepting those who had been at Cannæ. With respect to the several armies they ordered, that the conful Tiberius Sempronius should appoint a day for the two city legions to repair to Cale, from whence these legions should be conducted to the Claudian camp, above Sueffula. As to the legions which were there, confifting mostly of the troops who had been at Cannæ, it was ordered, that Applus Claudius Pulcher, the prætor, should transport them into Sicily, and that those then in Sicily should be brought home to Rome. To the army appointed

BOOK appointed to affemble at Cale, Marcus Claudius XXIII. Marcellus was fent with orders, to lead off those city legions to the Claudian camp. Appius Claudius sent Y.R.537. Titus Metellius Croto, lieutenant-general, to take the command of the old army, and transport it into Sicily. People had at first expected in silence, that the conful would call an affembly for the election of a colleague in his office: afterwards, when they faw that Marcus Marcellus, whom above all others they wished to be appointed conful for that year, on account of his extraordinary successful conduct in his prætorship, was, as it were purposely, sent out of the way, a murmur arose in the senate-house; on observing which, the consul faid, " Conscript Fa-"thers, the public fervice required, that Marcus "Claudius should go into Campania, to make the exchange of the armies; and that a day of " election should not be proclaimed until his re-"turn, after finishing the business given him in 66 charge, that you may have the conful whom " the exigencies of the state require, and who is " most agreeable to your wishes." After this, there was no mention of an election until Marcellus returned. In the mean time, Quintus Fabius Maximus, and Titus Otacilius Craffus, were created duumvirs for the dedication of temples, the latter to dedicate one to Mens, the former, that to Venus Erycina. Both stand in the Capitol, separated by a channel running between them. A proposition was then offered to the people respecting the three hundred Campanian horsemen, who, after faithfully serving out the legal term in Sicily, had returned to Rome, that they should be admitted Roman citizens; and moreover, that they should be deemed to have been citizens of Cumæ, from the day preceding that on which the people of Campania revolted from the Romans. The passing of this law was expedited by the representation of the men themselves, that they knew not to what people they belonged, having renounced renounced their original country, and being not yet BOOK adopted into that to which they had returned from XXIII. abroad. As foon as Marcellus came home from the Y.R.537. army, an affembly was summoned for the choice B.C. 215. of a conful, in the room of Lucius Postumius. Marcellus was unanimously elected, and ordered to enter immediately into office; but just as he was about to assume the administration, thunder was heard, and the augurs being called, pronounced, that there must have been a defect in the election; whereupon the patricians openly afferted that the appointment of two plebeians to the confulfhip, of which there had never before been an instance, was what gave displeasure to the gods. On this, Marcellus abdicated the office, in the place of whom was fubstituted Fabius Maximus, who had twice before been honoured with it. This year the fea appeared on fire; a cow at Sinuessa brought forth a foal; the statues in the temple of Juno Sospita at Lanuvium fweated blood; and a shower of stones fell round the same temple. On account of this shower the nine days worship, usual on like occafions, was performed, and the prodigies were carefully expiated.

XXXII. The confuls then made division of the forces affigned them. The army which had been with Marcus Junius, the dictator, fell to the share of Fabius; and that which had been composed of volunteer * flaves, together with twenty-five thousand of the allies, was given to Sempronius. The legions, to be brought home from Sicily, were decreed to Marcus Valerius, the prætor; and Marcus Claudius, proconful, was fent to command the army, encamped above Suesfula, for the protection of Nola. The prætors fet out for Sicily and Sardinia.

[•] Called volenes from volo, I am willing, the answer given by each when he was asked whether he was willing to enlist.

XXIII. Y.R.537. B.C. 215.

BOOK The confuls gave public orders, that whenever they should summon a meeting of the senate, the senators and persons entitled to the ptivilege of speaking in council*, should assemble at the Capuan gate. The practors, prefiding in the courts of justice, fixed their tribunals in the public fish-market; where they ordered all parties concerned to attend, and there justice was administered during that year. In the mean time, when Mago, Hannibal's brother, was just ready at Carthage to carry over into Italy twelve thousand foot, and one thousand five hundred horse, twenty elephants, and one thousand talents of filver t, under the convoy of fixty ships of war, news arrived, that the army in Spain had been defeated, and that almost every state of that province had gone over to the Romans. Several were now of opinion that they ought, for the present, to lay afide all concern for Italy, and fend Mago, with the fleet and army under his command, into Spain. And at this very juncture, a flattering prospect fuddenly presented itself, of recovering the possession of Sardinia: for they were told, that "the Roman 44 army there was fmall, and that Aulus Cornelius, 66 the prefent prætor, who was well acquainted with " the province, was preparing to leave it, and that a " new one was expected. They were informed 46 also that the minds of the Sardinians were become diffatisfied, under the burden of a foreign go-" vernment of fo long continuance; which had, "during the last year, been marked with cruelty and avarice; that the people were oppressed "with grievous taxes, and an unreasonable contribution of corn, and that nothing was wanting, but a head to whom they might transfer their allegiance." This intelligence was con-

^{*} All those who had held curule offices had a right to a feat in the fenate, and to give their opinions, but they could not vote until they were regularly admitted by the cenfors, and registered. + 193,75ol.

veyed by a fecret embasfy from the principal inha- BOOK bitants, at the infligation chiefly of Hampficora, who XXIII. at that time possessed a share of interest and influence, Y.R. 537. far exceeding that of any other man in the island. B.C. 215. These accounts arriving together almost at the same moment stunned, and revived them. They sent Mago with his fleet and army into Spain, and appointed Hasdrubal, surnamed the Bald, their general for Sardinia, affigning him a number of forces, nearly equal to what they had given Mago. At Rome, the confuls, after finishing every business that was to be performed in the city, were now actively employed in preparations for the campaign. Tiberius Sempronius published a proclamation, that his foldiers should assemble at Sinuessa on an appointed day; and Quintus Fabius, with the approbation of the fenate, issued another, that all persons should carry in their corn, of all kinds, from the fields to the fortified towns, before the calends of June next enfuing; and that if any disobeyed this order, his farm should be laid waste, his slaves sold by auction, and his farm-houses burnt. Even the prætors appointed to prefide in the courts of justice were not allowed an exemption from military employments: it was determined that the prætor Valerius should go into Apulia, to receive the command of the army from Terentius, and that, when the legions from Sicily should arrive, he should employ them principally in the defence of the country, and fend in their stead Terentius's army under some lieutenant-general. Twenty-five ships were also put under the command of Publius Valerius, the city prætor, that with them he might protect the fea-coast between Brundusium and Tarentum. An equal number were affigned to Quintus Fulvius, for fecuring the coasts nearest to the city. Caius Terentius, pro-conful, was ordered to press soldiers in the territory of Picenum, and to provide for the security of that part of the country; and Titus Otacilius CrasY.R. 537. B.C. 215.

BOOK sus, when he had dedicated the temple of Mens, was fent into Sicily, and invested with the command of the fleet.

> XXXIII. On this contest, between the two most powerful nations in the world, all kings and nations kept their attention earnestly fixed; but more particularly, Philip, king of Macedonia, because he was nearer to Italy than any other, being separated from it only by the Ionian sea. When he first received information of Hannibal having passed the Alps, as he was overjoyed at the breaking out of war between the Romans and Carthaginians, fo, as long as there was no important trial of their strength, his judgment remained equally balanced between the parties, uncertain to which he should wish success. But, when he faw that the Carthaginians had fought three battles, and in each of the three had proved victorious, the scale turned to the side favoured by fortune, and he dispatched ambassadors to Hannibal. These, shunning the harbours of Brundusium and Tarentum, because they were guarded by the Roman fquadrons, landed at the temple of Juno Lacinia; taking their way thence through Apulia, towards Capua, they fell in with the Roman posts, and were by them conducted to the prætor, Marcus Valerius Lævinus, then encamped near Luceria. Here Xenophanes, who was at the head of the embaffy, with perfect composure declared, that he had been fent by king Philip to conclude a treaty of alliance and friendship with the Roman people, and was charged with dispatches for the confuls, and for the fenate and people of Rome. Valerius, highly delighted with the prospect of a new alliance with a king of fuch diffinguished reputation, at a time when the defection of the old allies had become so general, received these enemies with every degree of courtely as guests, and gave them an escort, who were ordered to point out carefully the roads, and what places, and what passes were held by the BOOK Romans, or by the enemy. Xenophanes, after XXIII. passing through the Roman posts into Campania, Y.R.537. came thence, by the shortest road, into the camp of B.C.215. Hannibal, and concluded a treaty of alliance and friendship with him on these terms: That "King ⁶⁶ Philip, with the largest fleet that he could fit 'out, " (and it was supposed that he would be able to make " up the number of two hundred ships,) should come over into Italy, lay waste the sea-coast, and annoy "the enemy by fea and land, as far as lay in his " power. On the conclusion of the war, all Italy, with the city of Rome itself, should be the proer perty of Hannibal and the Carthaginians, and all " the booty should be at the disposal of Hannibal. " As foon as the conquest of Italy should be comof pleted, the Carthaginians should fail into Greece, and wage war against such nations as the king " fhould direct, and all conquests to be made on "the continent, and all the islands on the coast of "Macedonia, should be the property of Philip, and " united to his dominions."

XXXIV. On these conditions, principally, was a treaty concluded between the Carthaginian general and the Macedonian ambassadors; and with the latter were fent Gifgo, Bostar, and Mago, in quality of ambaffadors to receive the ratification of it from the king in person. They arrived at the same fpot near the temple of Juno Lacinia, where a ship lay waiting for them in a fecret creek. Having fet fail from thence, and got into the open sea, they were descried by the Roman fleet which guarded the coasts of Calabria: and Publius Valerius Flaccus dispatched some Corcyran fly-boats to pursue and bring back the ship. On which the king's party endeavoured, at first, to escape; but, asterwards, finding that they were inferior in swiftness of sail, they furrendered themselves to the Romans, and were

BOOK were brought to the commander of the fleet. When XXIII. he enquired who they were, whence, and whither K.R. 537. they were bound, Xenophanes, at first, repeated the B.C. 215. feigned story, which had once already succeeded very well, "that he had been fent by Philip to the "Romans, and had proceeded as far as the quar: " ters of Marcus Valerius, but could go no farther "with fafety, as it was not in his power to make " his way through Campania, every pass there being " guarded by the enemy." Afterwards, the Carthaginian dress and manners raised some suspicion of Hannibal's ambaffadors; and, fome questions being put to them, their language betrayed them; on which, their attendants were removed into separate places, and terrified with menaces, by which means Hannibal's letter to Philip was discovered, and also the articles of the convention between the Macedonian king and the Carthaginian general. defigns being thus fully detected, it was judged most advisable, that the prisoners, and their accompaniers, should with all speed be conveyed to the fenate at Rome, or to the confuls, wherever they were. For this fervice five of the quickest failing vessels were chosen, and the command of them given to Lucius Valerius Antias, who received orders to distribute the ambassadors through all the ships, to be kept separate under guards, and to take care that there should be no conversation or communication between them. About this time, Aulus Cornelius Mammula, returning from the province of Sardinia to Rome, gave a representation of the state of affairs in that island; that all the people were inclined to revolt; that Quintus Mucius, his fuccessor in the government, had on his coming been so affected by the groffness and moisture of the air, that he fell into a disorder, not so dangerous, as tedious, and confequently would, for a long time, be incapable of military fervice; and that the army there, though strong enough for the maintenance maintenance of order in the province, during a time BOOK of peace, was yet very unequal to the support of the XXIII. war, which appeared ready to break out. On this Y.R.537. the fenate decreed, that Quintus Fulvius Flaccus B.C. 215. should enlift five thousand foot, and four hundred horse; that he should take care to have this legion conveyed to Sardinia without any delay; and that he should lend some proper person, commissioned to conduct the business of the war, until Mucius's health should be re-established. In this employment was fent Titus Manlius Torquatus, who had been twice conful, and likewife cenfor, and who had, in one of his confulates, subdued Sardinia. About the same time the fleet from Carthage for Sardinia, under Hasdrubal, surnamed the Bald, after fuffering feverely in a violent storm, was driven out of its course to the Balearick isles, where a great deal of time was lost in docking and repairing the thips, for not only their rigging, but even their hulls, had been damaged.

XXXV. On the fide of Italy, the profecution of the war, fince the battle of Cannæ, had been less wigorous than usual, the strength of one party being broken, and the courage of the other enervated. The Campanians, therefore, undertook to bring the state of Cumæ into subjection to themselves. first, they tried to prevail on that people to renounce the alliance of Rome; but not fucceeding in that method, contrived a stratagem to circumvent them. There was a stated festival at Hamæ, at which all the Campanians used to attend. They told the Cumans, that the Campanian fenate would come thither, and requested that the senate of Cumæ might likewife come, in order that they might confult together, and, with common consent, adopt such measures as that both states might have the same friends and the same foes; they themselves, they faid, would bring an armed force for their protection,

BOOK so that there would be no danger either from the XXIII. Romans or Carthaginians. The Cumans, though they suspected treachery, yet offered no objection, Y.R. 537. thinking this the best way to cover the deception, B.C. 215. which they meditated. In the mean-time Tiberius Sempronius, the Roman conful, after performing the purification of his army at Sinuessa, where he had appointed them to affemble, croffed the river Vulturnus, and encamped at Liternum. As he had in this post no employment for his arms, he obliged the foldiers frequently to go through their exercise, that the recruits, of whom the greatest part were volunteer-flaves, might learn from practice to follow the standards, and to know their own centuries in the field. In the midst of these employments, the general's principal care was, and he accordingly gave charges to the lieutenants-general and tribunes, that " no reproach, cast on any one on account of his " former condition, should fow discord among the "troops; that the veteran foldier should be fatisfied " at being put on a level with the recruit, the free-" man with the volunteer-flave; that they should " account every one fufficiently honourable and "well-born, to whom the Roman people intrusted "their arms and standards; observing that, whatever measures fortune made it necessary to adopt, " it was equally necessary to support these when 46 adopted." These directions were not more carefully inculcated by the officers than observed by the foldiers; infomuch that, in a short time, they all became united in fuch a perfect harmony of fentiment. that it was almost forgotten what each man had been before he became a foldier. While Gracchus was thus employed, ambassadors from Cumæ brought him information of the embaffy which had come to them, a few days before, from the Campanians, and the answer which they had returned, and told him, that the festival would begin on the third day following, and that not only the whole fenate, but the 12

camp and army of the Campanians would be pre- BOOK fent. Having ordered the Cumans to convey all XXIII. their effects out of the fields into the city, and to Y R.537. keep close within the walls, Gracchus himself re- B.C. 215. moved to Cumæ, on the day previous to that which the Campanians had fixed for the commencement of their facrifices. From hence Hamæ was three miles distant. The Campanians, as had been concerted. had affembled here in great numbers, and at a fmall distance, Marius Alfius, who was Medixtuticus, that is, the chief magistrate of the Campanians, with fourteen thousand soldiers, was secretly encamped, and was much more bufily employed in preparations for the festival, and in the measures requisite for the execution of the treacherous project, than in fortifying his camp, or any other military work. The festival at Hamæ was to last three days, and the rites began after night-full, fo as to be finished at midnight. This hour Gracchus judged the most proper for a furprife, and accordingly, posting guards at the gates to prevent any one carrying intelligence of his defign, he obliged the foldiers to fpend the time from the tenth hour in taking refreshment and getting some sleep, that they might affemble on a fignal as foon as it grew dark; then, about the first watch, he ordered the standards to be raifed, and marching out in filence arrived at Hamæ at midnight. Here, finding the Campanian camp in a neglected state, as might be expected from the foldiers having spent the night without fleep, he affaulted it through all the gates at once, and put the men to the fword, fome as they lay stretched on the ground, others as they returned unarmed after finishing the facrifices. In the tumultuous action of this night there were more than two thousand men flain, together with their general Marius Alfius, and thirty-four military standards taken.

BOOK XXXVI. Gracchus, after making himself mafter XXIII. of the enemy's camp with the loss of less than one hundred men, returned quickly to Cumz, being B.C. 215. afraid of Hannibal, who had his camp on the Tifata over Capua. Nor was his judgment mif-taken in dictating this provident step; for no sooner had the news of the overthrow reached Hannibal. than he marched by Capua with the utmost rapidity, expecting to find at Hamæ an army, which confisted for the most part of raw recruits and flaves, indulging extravagant joy in confequence of fuccess, and employed in gathering the spoils of the vanquished, and driving off their booty. He ordered fuch of the Campanians as he met in their flight, to be conducted to Capua, under an escort, and the wounded to be conveyed in carriages. At Hamæ he found nothing but the traces of the recent carnage, and the ground covered with the bodies of his allies. Several now advised him to proceed directly to Cumæ, and attack that city: but, though it accorded with his anxious wishes to have Cumæ at least as a sea-port, since he could not get possession of Neapolis, nevertheless, as his foldiers, on their hasty march, had brought nothing but their arms, he retired back to his camp on the Tifata. Being afterwards earnestly urged to the attack by the Campanians, he returned next day to Cumæ with every thing requifite for a fiege, and after utterly wasting the country, pitched his camp at the distance of a mile from the city, in which Gracchus had determined to stay, rather through the shame of abandoning, at fuch a perilous juncture, allies imploring protection from him and the Roman people, than from any great confidence in his troops. Neither could the other conful, Fabius, who had his camp at Cales, venture to cross the river Vulturnus, being engaged at first in taking new auspices, afterwards in attending to prodigies, which were reported one after another; beside, while expiating these, he BOOK was told by the aruspices, that it would not be easy XXIII. to obtain favour of the gods.

Y.R.537. B.C. 215.

XXXVII. While Fabius was prevented from flirring by these causes, Sempronius was held befieged, and now was even exposed to the attacks of machines. Against a huge wooden tower, which was brought up near to the town, the Roman conful raifed another tower, much more elevated, by fixing strong piles contiguous to the wall, which in itself was very high. This the besieged formed into a platform, whence, throwing stones, javelins, and other missile weapons, they maintained the defence of their works and city. At last, when the machine had approached close to the wall, and with blazing firebrands, they threw on it all at once an immense quantity of combustibles; while the soldiers within, terrified by the flames, cast themselves down headlong from the fame. The garrison, fallying out from two gates at the very time, overthrew the enemy's advanced guards, and drove them back to their camp; so that the Carthaginian was, on that day, more like a person besieged than besieging. One thousand three hundred of the Carthaginians were flain, and fifty-nine taken prisoners, who, standing careless and negligently near the walls, and on the advanced posts, and fearing nothing less than a fally, were furprised unawares. Gracchus sounded a retreat before the enemy should recover from their fudden fright, and drew back his men within the walls. Next day Hannibal, supposing that the conful, elated with success, would be willing to try the issue of a regular engagement, drew up his forces in order of battle between his camp and the city: but when he faw that not a man stirred, except in the customary guard of the town, and that nothing would be hazarded on inconfiderate hopes, he returned with disappointment to the Tifata. At the

Y.R.537. B.C.215.

BOOK very time of the raifing the fiege of Cumæ, Tiberius Semprorius, furnamed Longus, fought with fuccels against Hanno at Grumentum in Lucania, killed above two thousand of the enemy, and took fortyone military standards, losing two hundred and eighty of his own men. Hanno, expelled from the Lucanian territorics, retreated backward into Bruttium. In another quarter, three towns of the Hirpinians, which had revolted from the Roman people, were attacked and retaken by the prætor, Marcus Valerius. Vercellius and Sicilius, the instigators of the revolt, were beheaded, and above one thousand of the prisoners exposed to sale: the rest of the booty was bestowed on the soldiers, and then the troops were led back to Luceria.

> XXXVIII. While affairs proceeded thus in Lucania and Hipinia, the five ships carrying the captive ambassadors of the Macedonians and Carthaginians to Rome, after making a circuit from the upper sea to the lower, round the greater part of the coast of Italy, were failing by Cumæ, when they were observed by Gracchus, who not knowing whether they belonged to friends or enemies, fent a part of his fleet to meet then. Here mutual enquiries discovering that the conful was at Cumæ, the ships put into that harbour, the prisoners were conducted to the conful, and the packet they had in charge delivered to him. Having read the letters of Philip and Hannibal, he inclosed, and lent them to the senate by land, ordering the ambassadors to be conveyed thither by fea. These, with the inclofures, arrived at Rome on the fame day, or nearly; and the answers of the former on their examination being conformable to the contents of the letters, the fenate were at first grievously perplexed at the profpect of fuch a formidable war impending from Macedonia, when they were fcarcely able to support that with the Carthaginians. Yet, so far were they

from

from fuffering their courage to be depressed, that BOOK they instantly began to deliberate how they might, by offensive operations, divert the enemy from Italy. Y.R. 537. After ordering the prisoners to be kept in close con- B.C. 215. finement, and their attendants to be exposed to public fale, they decreed, that, besides the twenty ships, under the command of Publius Valerius Flaccus, twenty-five others thould be got ready for fea. These being equipped and launched, and joined by the five which had brought the captive ambassadors, fet fail from Ostia for Tarentum, and orders were fent to Publius Valerius to take on board them the foldiers, formerly commanded by Varro, and who were then at l'arentum under Lucius Apustius, lieutenant-general; and, with his fleet, which would then confift of fifty ships, not only to protect the coast of Italy, but to procure intelligence concerning the hostile designs of the Macedonians. If Philip's intentions were found to correspond with the letters, and the informations of the ambaffadors, he was then to forward intelligence of this to the prætor, Marcus Valerius, who, leaving the command of the army to his lieutenant-general, Lucius Apuftius, and hastening to Tarentum to the fleet, was to cross over into Macedonia with all expedition, and use his best endeavours to detain Philip in his own dominions. For the maintenance of the fleet, and the support of the war with Macedonia, that money was ordered to be applied, which had been fent into Sicily to Appius Claudius to be returned to King Hiero, and this was conveyed to Tarentum by the lieutenant-general, Lucius Apustius. Together with it, were fent by Hiero two hundred thousand pecks of wheat, and one hundred thousand of barley.

XXXIX. While the Romans were employed in this manner, and making fuch preparations, the captured M 4

Y.R.537.

BOOK captured ship, which had been sent with the others XXIII. to Rome, made its escape on the voyage, and returned to Philip; by which means he learned, that his am-B.C. 215. baffadors, with the letters, had fallen into the hands of the Romans. Wherefore, as he knew not what terms of agreement had been fettled between them and Hannibal, nor what accounts they would have brought him, he dispatched another embassy with the fame instructions. The persons employed in this commission to Hannibal were Heraclitus, surnamed Scotinus, Crito Berræus, and Sofithetts Magnes: these effected the business with which they were charged, without meeting any obstruction, either in going or returning. But the summer had passed away before Philip could put himself in motion, or enter on any enterprize: fo important were the consequences attending the capture of that single vessel with the ambassadors, as to defer the war with which the Romans were threatened. regard to the campaign in the neighbourhood of Capua, Fabius, after expiating the prodigies, paffed the Vulturnus, and then both the confuls entered on Fabius took by affault Combulteria, Trebula, and Saticula, (cities which had revolted to the Carthaginian,) and in them were made prisoners!Hannibal's garrisons, and vast numbers of Campanians. At Nola, as was the case the year before, the senate being inclined to the fide of the Romans, and the populace to that of the Carthaginians, the latter held fecret cabals, in which schemes were formed for massacring the nobility and delivering up the city: but to prevent their designs taking effect, Fabius, marching his army across between Capua and Hannibal's camp on the Tifata, took post over Suessula in the Claudian camp, and thence detached Marcus Marcellus, proconful, with the troops under his command, to fecure the possession of Nola.

XL. In Sardinia the business of the campaign, BOOK which had been suspended ever since the prætor XXIII. Quintus Mucius had been seized with a severe dif-Y.R.537. order, began to be profecuted by Titus Manlius, B.C. 216. who, drawing the ships of war into dock at Carale, and arming the marines to act on land, made up, with the army which he received from Mucius, the number of twenty-two thousand foot, and twelve With this force he marched into hundred horse. the enemy's country, and pitched his camp at a small distance from that of Hampsicora. It happened that at this time the latter had gone into the country of those Sardinians, called Pelliti, with design to procure a reinforcement to his army by inlifting their young men: his ion, named Hiostus, commanded in the camp, and he, with the presumption of youth, inconfiderately hazarding an engagement, was defeated, and put to flight; three thousand of the Sardinians being flain in the battle, and about eight hundred taken. The rest of the troops, at first, ran straggling through the fields and woods; but, afterwards, all directed their flight to Cornus, the principal city in that country, into which they heard that their commander had fled. This battle would have put an end to the war in Sardinia, had not the Carthaginian fleet under Hasdrubal, which had been driven out of its course to the Balearick isles, arrived just in time to revive the hopes of the revolters. Manlius, on hearing of the arrival of the Carthaginian fleet, marched back to Carale; and this afforded an opportunity to Hampsicora of effecting a junction with the Carthaginian. Hasdrubal, when he had disembarked his troops, sent back the fleet to Carthage; and then, using Hampsicora as a guide, he marched, with fire and fword, into the lands belonging to the allies of the Roman people, and would have proceeded even to Carale, had not Manlius, by throwing his army in the way, checked the violence of his depredations. For some time,

BOOK they lay encamped opposite to each other, at a small XXIII. distance; then followed skirmishes and encounters between finall parties, in which fuccefs was various. Y.R. 537. At last they marched out to battle, and, meeting in B.C. 215. regular array, maintained a general engagement for the space of four hours. That the victory remained fo long in suspense was owing to the Carthaginians, for the Sardinians had now been accustomed to vield an eafy corquest. At last, when nothing was to be feen on any fide of them but the flight and flaughter of the Sardinians, they also gave way. But just as they were turning their backs, the Roman general, wheeling round with that wing of his army which had beaten the Sardinians, inclosed their rear, and then followed a carnage rather than a fight. Of the Sardinians and Carthaginians together, there fell twelve thousand; about three thousand fix hundred, with twenty-seven military standards, were taken.

> XLI. But what contributed, above all, to render this fuccess brilliant and memorable, was, the taking of the general Hasdrubal, and two other Carthaginians of high distinction, Hanno and Mago; Mago being of the Barcine family, and nearly related to Hannibal, and Hanno the person who instigated the Sardinians to a revolt, and unquestionably the author of the present war. Nor was the fortune of the Sardinian commanders, on this occasion, less remarkable; for Hiostus, son of Hampsicora, fell in the fight; and the father, after having fled with a few horsemen, when, in addition to his other misfortunes, he heard also of his son's death, put an end to his own life in the night-time, left some interruption might prevent his defign: to the rest, the city of Cornus, as on the former occasion, afforded a refuge; but Manlius attacking it with his victorious troops, made himself master of it in a few days. On this, the rest of those states, which had joined Hampsicora and the Carthaginians, made their submission, and BOOK gave hostages. Having imposed on these, in pro- XXIII. portion to the power or delinquency of each, con- Y.R. 357. tributions of corn, and pay for the troops, he led B.C. 215. back his army to Carale; and there, launching the ships of war, and embarking the troops which he had brought to the island, he sailed to Rome, and informed the fenate of the total reduction of Sardinia, delivered the money railed by the contributions to the quæstors, the corn to the ædiles, and the prisoners to the prætor Quintus Fulvius. About the fame time Titus Otacilius, proprætor, failing over from Lilybæum to Africa with a fleet of fifty ships, ravaged the Carthaginian territories. As he was returning to Sardinia, on hearing that Hasdrubal had lately crossed over thither from the Baleares, he met his fleet on its way from Africa; and, after a flight engagement in the open fea, took feven of the ships, with their crews. Their fears dispersed the rest not less effectually than a storm would have done. It happened that, at the fame time. Bomilcar with supplies of men and provisions, and forty elephants fent from Carthage, put into the harbour of Locri. On which Appius Claudius, intending to furprize him, drew all his forces hastily to Messana, under a pretext of making a circuit round the island, and with the favour of the tide croffed over to Locri; but Bomilcar had already left the place, and gone to join Hanno in Bruttium, and the Locrians shut their gates against the Romans. Without effecting any thing by fuch a powerful effort, Appius returned to Messana.

XI.II. During this fummer Marcellus made frequent excursions from Nola, where he was stationed in garrison, into the lands of the Hirpinians and Caudine Samnites, and with fire and fword caufed fuch utter devastation through every part of the country, as renewed in Samnium the memory of BOOK those calamities which they had suffered of old. XXIII. Both nations therefore immediately joined in fending ambassadors to Hannibal, who addressed him in this W.R.537. manner: "Hannibal, we, by ourselves, waged war against the Roman people, as long as our own " arms, and our own strength, were sufficient for our defence: when we found that we could no " longer trust to these, we united ourselves to King " Pyrrhus; by whom being deferted, we submitted "to a peace, which our circumstances made ne-" ceffary, and which we continued to observe, "through a space of almost fixty years, to the time "when you came into Italy. Your kind de-" meanour and fingular generofity to our country" men, whom, when prifoners in your hands, you " restored to us, as well as your bravery and suc-" cefs, inspired us with fuch esteem and admiration, that having you in health and fafety to befriend " us, we feared not the resentment of the Roman ee people, nor (if it is allowable fo to fpeak) even "that of the gods. But now, indeed, while you " are not only in fafety, and possessed of victory, " but while you are present, and can, in a manner, "hear the lamentations of our wives and children, " and fee our houses in flames; still, we say, we have " experienced, in the course of this summer, such depredations, that it feems as if Marcus Marcellus, " not Hannibal, were the conqueror at Cannæ; the 66 Romans boasting, that you had just vigour enough " for that one stroke, and having as it were lost " your fting, are now become a drone. For near " one hundred years, we maintained a war against " the Roman people, without the affistance of any " foreign leader or army, fince in the two years "that Pyrrhus was joined with us, he rather aug-" mented his own forces with our strength, than " defended us with his. I shall not make a display " of our fuccesses, except in sending under the "yoke two confuls and two confular armies;

" though it is certain that other events have con- BOOK " tributed to our glory. As to the difficulties and XXIII. misfortunes which we then underwent, we can Y.R.537. ff recount them with less indignation, than those B.C. 216. 46 which fall upon us this day. Renowned dicta-45 tors, with their masters of horse; two consuls, 66 with two consular armies at a time, were used to ⁶⁶ enter our territories; and, with every precaution " of first exploring the country, and posting rear " guards, proceeded in order of battle to commit "depredations; at present we are in a manner "the prey of one little garrison, which is scarcely 66 fufficient to man the walls of Nola. They fcour 66 every quarter of our country; not in companies, 46 but like common robbers, with less precaution 66 than they would use in rambling through the " province of Rome. Now the cause of this is, "that you do not afford us protection, and that at "the same time our youth, who, if at home, would 66 defend us, are all employed under your standards. "As we are not unacquainted with you or your 66 forces; as we know that you have defeated 46 and cut off fo many armies of Romans; furely "we must judge it an easy matter for you to overso power those marauders amongst us, who straggle " about without order, and ramble wherever allured 66 by the flightest hope of gain. They may be in-" stantly subdued by a handful of Numidians; and " while you fend supporters to us, you will, by "the fame means, strip the Nolans of theirs. In " fine, it is hoped that after having taken us under 66 your protection, and deemed us worthy of alli-" ance, you do not now judge us undeserving your " interference in our defence."

XLIII. To this Hannibal answered, that "the "Hirpinians and Samnites did too many things " at once; they represented their sufferings, petise tioned for protection, and at the same time com-" plained of being undefended and neglected. " Whereas,

BOOK "Whereas, they ought first to make the represen-XXIII. " tation; then to request protection; and, in the " last place, if their request were not complied Y.R.537. " with, then, and not before, to complain of having. B.C.215. "implored aid in vain. That he would lead his " army not into the territories of the Hirpinians or Samnites, lest he should prove an additional burthen, but into the nearest places belonging of to the allies of the Roman people; by the " plunder of which, he would enrich his foldiers, " and, at the fame time, by the terror of his arms, " drive far away the enemy from them. As to " what concerned the war between him and Rome, " if the fight at the Trasimenus was more honour-" able than that at the Trebia, and the one at "Cannæ than that at the Trasimenus, he was re-" folved, by a still more complete and more splendid " victory, to eclipse the lustre of the battle of "Cannæ." With this answer, and with ample presents, he dismissed the ambassadors; and leaving a fmall body of troops on the Tisata, began his march with the rest of his army, and proceeded to Nola. Thither also came Hanno from Bruttium. with the supplies and the elephants brought from Carthage. Having encamped at no great distance from the town, he found, on enquiry, every circumstance widely different from the representations made by the ambassadors of his allies. For no part of Marcellus's conduct was fuch, as could be faid to leave an unguarded opening either to fortune or to an enemy. When going to a plundering expedition, his practice had been to procure a knowledge of the country; to provide strong supports and a safe retreat; and to use every care and caution just as if Hannibal were present. At this time, when he perceived the Carthaginian approaching, he kept his troops within the walls, and ordered the fenators of Nola to walk round on the ramparts, and take a view on every fide of what passed among the enemy. From the

the other fide, Hanno, coming up to the wall, in- BOOK vited Herennius Baffus and Herius Pettius to a con-XXIII. ference; and when, with the permission of Mar-Y.R. 537. cellus, they came out, he addressed them by an BC.215. "But," faid interpreter, extolled Hannibal's courage and fuccess, and in the most contemptuous terms vilified the majesty of the Roman people, as mouldering into decay, together with their strength. he, "fuppofing all matters were on the fame footing 46 as before, yet as it is found by experience how burthensome the government of Rome is to its con-66 federates, and how great the generofity of Hannibal has been, even to every one of his prisoners, who bore the name of an Italian, an alliance of " of friendship with the Carthaginians was furely to be wished in preference to one with the Romans. "If both the confuls, with their armies, were at "Nola, they would no more be able to cope with "Hannibal, than they had been at Cannæ; much 66 less would a single prætor, with a handful of men, " and these raw recruits, he equal to the desence of "Nola. Whether Hannibal was to gain possession 66 of that town by florm, or by capitulation, was a es matter which concerned themselves more than 66 him, for gain it he would, as he had gain. 1 "Capua and Nuceria; and how different the fare of Capua was from that of Nuceria, the Nolans 66 themselves, situated about midway between the "two places, could not but know. He refrained " from mentioning the consequences which necessa-" rily followed the taking of a city by affault; " and with more pleasure took upon him to engage, "that, if they would deliver up Nola, together "with Marcellus and the garrison, they should "themselves dictate the terms on which they were " to be received into friendship and alliance with " Hannibal."

BOOK

XLIV. To this Herennius Bassus replied, that, XXIII. " for many years past, a friendship had subsisted be-. tween the states of Rome and Nola, with which Y.R.537. " neither party had, to that day, seen reason to be " diffatisfied; and that though people's attachments were to follow the changes of fortune, it was now • too late for them to change theirs. Men who « were afterwards to furrender to Hannibal ought " not to have fent for a Roman garrison. Their " destiny was now, and would continue to be, to the last, connected, in every particular with that " of the person who came to their support." conference took away from Hannibal all hope of gaining Nola by treachery; he therefore invested the city quite round, intending to attack the walls in all parts at once. When Marcellus faw him approach the works, having formed his troops within the gate, he fallied forth with great impetuolity. At the first push, several were beaten down and slain; then others running up to those who were engaged, and their power being brought to an equality, the battle became furious, and would have been memorable among the few which are most celebrated, had not violent rain, attended by a desperate storm, separated the combatants. After this small trial of strength, which served only to irritate their pasfions, they retired for that day, the Romans into the city, the Carthaginians into their camp. However on the first irruption, some of the Carthaginians, not above thirty, fell under the shock, and not one of the Romans. The rain continued without intermission through the whole night, and lasted until the third hour of the following day. Wherefore, notwithstanding that both parties eagerly longed for battle, yet they remained during that day within their works. On the third day, Hannibal sent a part of his forces to ravage the lands of the Nolans; which, when Marcellus observed, he instantly drew out his forces and offered battle, nor did Hannibal decline decline the challenge. The distance between the BOOK city and the camp was about a mile: in this space, XXIII. which was level, as is all the ground about Nola, Y.R.537. the armies met. The shout raised, on both sides, B.C. 215. called back the nearest of those cohorts which had gone into the country for plunder, to the battle, which had begun when they arrived. The Nolant joined themselves to the Roman forces; and Marcellus, after commending their zeal, ordered them to take post in reserve, and to carry off the wounded from the line; but, by no means to engage in the fight, unless they received a fignal from him.

XLV. The battle was long doubtful, every one exerting himself to the utmost, the officers in encouraging the men, and the men in fighting. Marcellus urged his foldiers to press briskly on those whom they had defeated but three days before; who had been put to flight from Cumæ not many days fince, and who, in the last year, had been repulsed from Nola by himself, then likewise in command, though with other troops. "All the enemy's "forces," he told them, "were not in the field; 66 fome of them were rambling through the country " in fearch of prey; and those who were in the 66 fight were debilitated by Campanian luxury, having exhausted their vigour in the practice of " every kind of intemperance and debauchery, "through the whole course of the winter. Their former strength was gone, they were no longer " possessed of that firmness, either of body or mind, "which had enabled them to furmount the Py-" renean and the Alpine heights. Those they had " now to engage with, might be called the shadows - " of those armies: men scarcely able to support "their limbs and armour. Capua to Hannibal had 44 not proved a Cannæ. There, warlike courage; N

BOOK "there, military discipline; there, the glory of the XXIII. " past, and the hope of future times, were all extin-" guished." While Marcellus raised the courage of his men by fuch contemptuous representations of the enemy, Hannibal upbraided his in terms of reproach far more bitter: " He knew these," he said, " to be " the fame arms and standards, which he had feen " and used at the Trebia, at the Trasimenus, and " at Cannæ; but as to the men, he had certainly " led one army into winter-quarters to Capua, " and brought out thence another of a different 46 kind. Do you, whom two confular armies united " have never withstood, find it difficult, with all "your efforts, to stand against a Roman lieute-" nant-general, against the exertions of one legion, " and a band of auxiliaries? Does Marcellus, with " his raw recruits and Nolan auxiliaries, attack " us a fecond time with impunity? Where is that " foldier of mine who dragged the conful Caius "Flaminius from his horse, and took off his " head? Where is he who flew Lucius Paullus " at Cannæ? Has the fword loft its edge? . Are 46 your right hands benumbed; or what other pro-"digy is this? You, who used to conquer, when " the advantage in number was against you, now, "when that advantage is in your favour, scarcely maintain your ground. With great bravery in " your tongues, you were used to declare, that " you would take Rome if any one would lead " you to it; the present is a much less difficult " business. I wish to have a trial of your strength " and courage here. Take Nola, a town stand-" ing in a plain, and not fenced by either fea " or river; and then, when you are laden with "the plunder and spoils of that opulent city, I " will either lead or follow you whitherfoever you " choose,"

XLVI. Neither foothing nor reproaches wrought BOOK any effect towards confirming their courage. They XXIII. loft ground in every quarter, while the Romans affumed fresh spirits, not only from the exhortations B.C.215. of their commander, but from the animating shouts raised by the Nolans, in testimony of their good The Carthaginians, at length, gave up the contest, and were driven into their camp; and even this the Roman foldiers were eager to attack; but Marcellus drew them back into Nola, where they were received with great joy, and congratulations, even by the populace, who till then had been more inclined to the Carthaginians. On that day were flain more than five thousand of the enemy; taken, fix hundred, with nineteen military standards, and two elephants; four of the latter were killed in the battle. Of the Romans there fell not quite one Both, as if by a tacit convention, spent the next day in burying their dead, and Marcellus, in pursuance of a vow to Vulcan, burned the spoils. On the third day after, one thousand two hundred and feventy-two horfemen, partly Numidians, and partly Spaniards, through fome refentment, I suppose, or hopes of better treatment, deferted to Marcellus; and these, during the remainder of the war, ferved the Romans, on many occasions, with much bravery and fidelity. After the conclusion of it, ample portions of land were assigned to them in acknowledgment of their valour; to the Spaniards, in Spain, and to the Numidians, Hannibal, fending back Hanno from Nola to Bruttium, with the forces which he had brought thence, went himself into winter-quarters in Apulia, and cantoned his troops in the neighbourhood of Arpi. When Quintus Fabius heard that the foe was gone into Apulia, he collected stores of corn from Nola, and Neapolis, in the camp above Sueffula, the fortifications of which he strengthened; and, N 2

BOOK leaving there a garrison, sufficient for the security XXIII. of the post, during the winter, removed nearer Y.R. 537. to Capua, laying waste the country of Campania, B.C. 215. with fire and sword, to such a degree, that the people were compelled, though with no great confidence in their own strength, to go out of their gates, and fortify a camp near the city in theopen plain. Their force amounted to fix thou-fand men. The infantry being very indifferent foldiers, their principal reliance was on the cavalry: these, therefore, they employed in annoying the enemy.

> XLVII. Among a great number of Campanian horsemen, of high reputation, was Cerrinus Jubellius, furnamed Taurea. He was a native there, and celebrated for his abilities as a horseman far beyond all the others of that country, infomuch that while he acted in the fervice of Rome, there was but one Roman, Claudius Afellus, who had an equal reputation in that line. For this man, Taurea long fearched as he rode before the fquadrons of the enemy. At last, demanding attention, he enquired where was Claudius Afellus, and why, fince he had been accustomed to affert himself to be his equal, did he not decide the point with the fword; and either by fuffering a defeat give glorious spoils, or by victory acquire them? When this was reported, in the camp, to Afellus, he only waited to ask the consul's leave to engage, though out of rule, with the challenger. Having obtained permission, he instantly armed himself, and riding out beyond the advanced guards, called on Taurea by name, and dared him to the field. The Romans had now come in crowds to behold the fight; and the Campanians, to gain a view of it, had filled not only the rampart of the camp, but likewise the walls of the city. After a prelude of furious furious expressions, to give the business an air of the BOOK greater consequence, they spurred on their horses, XXIII. with their spears prepared for action. Having free Y.R.537. space, wherein they parried each other's assaults, the B.C. 215. fight lasted for some time without a wound on either side. At length the Campanian said to the Roman, 46 this will be but a trial of skill between our horses. " not between their riders, unless we descend into

" you hollow way. There, as there will be no room " for wheeling to one fide or another, we may " meet hand to hand." Scarcely were the words uttered, when Claudius leaped his horse down into the road, on which Taurea, more daring in words than in action, said, "Never be an ass in a "dyke," which expression became afterwards proverbial among rustics. Claudius, riding up again into the plain, traversed the ground to a considerable distance from the road, without meeting any antagonist; and then, exclaiming against the cowardice of his foe, returned victorious to the camp, amidst general rejoicing and congratulations. To this encounter, some histories add a wonderful circumstance, (how far worthy of belief, the reader may judge for himself,) that Claudius, pursuing Taurea, as he fled back to the city, rode in at one of the enemy's gates which stood open, and escaped unhurt through another, while the foldiers stood motionless through astonishment.

Less through astonishment.

XLVIII. From this time the troops remained without employment, and the conful even drew back his camp to a distance, that the Campanians might fill their grounds; nor did he offer any injury to the lands, until the blades in the corn fields were sufficiently grown to serve as forage. He then conveyed the corn in this state into the Claudian camp over Suessula, where he erected huts against the winter. He gave orders to Marcus Claudius, nro.

BOOK pro-conful, that, retaining at Nola a garrifon fufficient XXIII. for the defence of the place, he should send the rest of his force to Rome, left they should be a burden Y.R.537. to the allies, and an expence to the state. another quarter, Tiberius Gracchus having led his legions from Cumæ to Luceria in Apulia, detached thence the prætor, Marcus Valerius, to Brundusium, with the troops which he had commanded at Luceria, ordering him to guard the coast of the Sallentine territory, and carefully pursue all such measures as should be found requisite with respect to Philip, and the Macedonian war. Towards the close of that fummer, in which happened those events which we have related, letters arrived from the Scipios, Pubhius and Cneius, fetting forth the great importance and fuccessful issue of their operations in Spain; but that they were in want of every thing, pay, clothing, and corn for the army, and the crews of the ships. With regard to the pay, they observed, that, if the treasury were low, they would themfelves devife some method of procuring it from the Spaniards; but that the other articles must, at all events, be fent from Rome, otherwife, neither the army, nor the province, could be preferved. When the letters were read, both the truth of the facts represented, and the reasonableness of the demands, were univerfally acknowledged; but they were struck by the following considerations: " What " numerous forces on land and fea they were " obliged to maintain; and, what a large ad-"ditional fleet must soon be provided, in case " of a war with Macedonia breaking out. That " Sicily and Sardinia, which, before, had yield-" ed a revenue, now fcarcely maintained the "troops employed in their own defence. That "the public expences were supplied by a task; " but as the number of those who contributed to "this tax, had been diminished by the great " flaughter

" flaughter of the troops at the Trasimenus, and at BOOK " Cannæ; fo the furviving few, if loaded with mul- XXIII. " tiplied impositions, must perish likewise, only by Y.R. 537. " a different malady. It was therefore concluded, BC.215. 46 that, if the state did not find support in credit, it " could find none in money; and it was judged " proper, that the prætor, Fulvius, should go out " to the affembly of the commons, and lay before the " people the necessitous situation of the country; " exhorting them, that fuch as had increased their " estates by farming the public revenues, should " now affift that government, to which they owed "their prosperity, with indulgence in respect of 46 time; and that they should engage to furnish, by " contract, the supplies necessary for the army in "Spain, on condition, when money should come " into the treasury, of being the first paid." These matters the prætor explained in the affembly, and gave public notice of the day, on which he would contract for the supplying of clothing, and corn, for the army in Spain, and fuch other things as were necessary for the men on board the fleet.

XLIX. When the time came, three companies, confisting of nineteen men, attended, in order to engage in the contract. Their demands were two-fold: first, that they should be exempted from military service as long as they might be concerned in this business of the state; the other, that when they had sent goods on ship-board, any damage afterwards sustained either through the means of storms, or of the energy, should be at the public loss. Both being complied with, they concluded the contract, and with the money of private persons: such were the habits of thinking, such the love of their country, which, with uniform influence, pervaded all ranks of men. As all engagements were entered into with great

XXIII. B.C. 215.

BOOK great spirit, so were they fulfilled with the most faithful punctuality, and exactly in the fame manner, as if the supplies were drawn, as formerly, out of an opulent treasury. At this time, the town of Illiturgi, having revolted to the Romans, was belieged by Hafdrubal, Mago, and Hamilcar fon of Bomilcar. Between these three camps, the Scipios, after a difficult struggle, and a great slaughter of their opponents, forced their way into the place, introducing quantity of corn, of which there had been a scarcity. Then, after exhorting the townsmen to defend their walls, with the same courage with which they had feen the Roman troops fight in their behalf, they marched to attack the largest of the camps, where Hasdrubal had the command. Thither also came up the two other Carthaginian generals, with their two armies, who perceived that on the iffue of that attack the fate of all depended: the troops in camp therefore fallied out to the fight. There were in the engagement, of the enemy, fixty thousand; of the Romans about fixteen thousand; yet so far was the victory from being doubtful, that the Romans flew a greater number of the Carthaginians than they themselves had in the sield; took above three thousand prisoners; somewhat lese than one thousand horses; fifty-nine military standards; killed five elephants in the battle; and took possession of the three camps on one and the same day. When the siege of Illiturgi was thus raised, the Carthaginian armies marched to lay fiege to Intibili; recruiting their forces our of that province, which was, above all others, fond of war, provided either plunder or hire was in view, and which, at that time, abounded with young men. A fecond general engagement took place, attended with the fame event on both fides •

fides: upwards of thirteen thousand of the enemy were killed, and more than two thousand taken, with forty-two standards and nine elephants. On this, almost every state in Spain joined the party of B.C. 215. the Romans; and, during this campaign, the events of the war there were much more important than those in Italy.

HISTORY OF ROME.

BOOK XXIV.

Hiermynus, king of Syracuse, takes part with the Carthaginians; is put to death by his subjects, on account of his tyranny and cruelty. Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, proconsul, with an army composed mostly of slaves, defeats the Carthaginian army under Hanno, at Beneventum; gives the slaves liberty. Most of the States in Sicily go over to the side of the Carthaginians. Claudius Marcellus, consul, beseges Syracuse. War declared against Philip king of Macedonia, who is surprised by night, and routed at Apollonia. Operations of the Scipios, against the Carthaginians, in Spain. Treaty of friendship with Syphak king of Numidia; he is defeated by Massinissa king of the Massylians. The Celtiberians join the Romans, and their troops are taken into pay: the sirst instance of mercenaries serving in a Roman army.

N his return from Campania into Bruttium, Hanno, affifted by the Bruttians, who ferved him also as guides, endeavoured to gain possession of the Greek cities, which were the more inclined to adhere to their alliance with Rome, for the very reason that they saw the Bruttians, whom they both hated and feared, taking part with the Carthaginians.

nians. The first attempt was made on Rhegium, BOOK and feveral days were spent there to no purpose. XXIV. Meanwhile the Locrians hastily conveyed from the country into the city, corn, timber, and other neceffaries, for which they might have occasion, wishing at the same time to leave nothing which the enemy could feize; while the multitude, which poured out of the gates, became every day more and more numerous. At last, those only were left in the place, who were obliged to repair the works, and to carry weapons to the posts of defence. Against this mixed multitude, consisting of persons of all ages and ranks, and straggling through the fields, mostly unarmed, Hamilcar, the Carthaginian, fent out his cavalry, who, having received orders not to hurt any of them, only threw their fquadrons in the way to cut off their retreat to the city, towards which they directed their scattered flight. The general himself, having taken his station on an eminence, which commanded a view both of that and the adjacent country, ordered a cohort of Bruttians to approach the walls, and invite the leaders of the Locrians to a conference, and, with affurances of Hannibal's friendship, to persuade them to a surrender. At the beginning of the conference, the Bruftians had no credit given to any of their repre-Afterwards, when the Carthaginians fentations. appeared on the hills, and the few citizens, who had effected an escape, had informed the townsmen that the rest of the multitude were in the enemy's power, then, overcome by fear, they answered, that they would confult the people. Accordingly, they inftantly fummoned an affembly, in which appeared all of the most unsettled who wished for a change of measures and of allies, with those, whose relations had been intercepted by the enemy, and who had their judgments influenced by those pledges, as if so many hostages had been given for their conduct;

while.

BOOK while a few rather approving in filence, than venturing openly to maintain the cause which they would have espoused, it was concluded, with every appear-Y.R. 537. ance of perfect unanimity, to furrender to the Carthaginians. Lucius Atilius, the commander of the garrison, and the Roman soldiers who were with him, were privately conveyed to the harbour, and put on board ships, to be carried off to Rhegium, and then the townsmen received Hasdrubal and his Carthaginians into the city, on the condition of an alliance being immediately entered into on terms of equality. When they had furrendered, they were very near losing the benefit of this stipulation; for the Carthaginian general accused them of having covertly fent away the Roman commander, while they alleged that he had escaped without their privity. A body of cavalry was now fent in pursuit, in case, by any accident, the current might detain him in the streight, or drive the ships to land: these did not overtake him; but they faw other ships crossing from Messana to Rhegium, which carried Roman foldiers, fent by the prætor, Claudius, as a garrison for the security of that city: in consequence of this, the enemy withdrew immediately from Rhegium. In pursuance of orders from Hannibal, a treaty of peace was concluded with the Locrians, on these terms, that "they should live in freedom under " their own laws; that the city should be open " always to the Carthaginians, but that the harbour " should remain in their possession, as at first; and "that, as the fundamental principle of the treaty, "the Carthaginians should, on all occasions, assist the "Locrians, and the Locrians the Carthaginians."

> II. The Carthaginians, after this, marched back from the streight, while the Bruttians expressed great diffatisfaction at their having left Rhegium and Locri in safety, for they had destined to themfelves felves the plunder of those places. Wherefore, BOOK having formed into bodies, and armed fifteen XXIV. thousand of their own young men, they fet out Y.R. 537. to lay fiege to Croto, another Grecian city and a B.C. 215. fea-port; thinking that it would prove a very great accession to their power, if they should gain posfession of an harbour on the coast, and of a strongly fortified town. They were embarrassed by the confiderations, that they could not well venture to proceed without calling in the Carthaginians to their affiftance, lest they should appear to conduct themfelves, in any case, inconsistently with the character of confederates; and that, on the contrary, should the Carthaginian general again act rather as an umpire of peace, than an auxiliary in war, the attack on the independence of Croto, like the former one on Locri, would be productive, to them, of no advantage. For these reasons it was judged most advisable to fend ambassadors to Hannibal, to procuse from him beforehand an engagement, that Cloto, when reduced, should be the property of the Bruttians. Hannibal, remarking that persons on the spot were the fittest to determine in such a case, referred them to Hanno, from whom they could obtain no decifive answer: for these commanders did not wish that a city, fo celebrated and fo opulent, should be plundered; and, at the same time, they entertained hopes, that, as the Bruttians were to be the affailants, the Carthaginians not appearing either to countenance or aid the attack, the inhabitants might, the more readily, come over to their fide. the Crotonians were not united in their defigns, or in their wishes. The same distemper, as it were. had seized every one of the states of Italy; the nobility and commons embracing opposite parties, the former favouring the Romans, the latter violently endeavouring to bring about an union with the Carthaginians. A deferter informed the Bruttians, that a diffension of this fort prevailed in Croto, that one Aristomachus

BOOK Aristomachus headed the party of the commons, XXIV. and pressed them to surrender to the Carthaginians; that the city, being very extensive, and the works Y.R. 537. that the city, being very extensive, and the works B.C. 215. stretching to a great extent on all sides, the watches were divided separately between the senators and commons; and that, in every quarter, where the latter had the guard, the affailants would find a ready entrance. Under the direction and guidance of this deferter, the Bruttians encircled the town, and being received into it by the plebeians, carried, at the first assault, every post except the citadel; of this the nobles held the possession, having beforehand secured a refuge there, in case of such an event as now happened. Aristomachus also sled thither, pretending that he had advised furrendering the city to the Carthaginians, not to the Bruttians.

> III. Before the coming of Pyrrhus into Italy, the wall encompassing Croto was twelve miles in circumference; fince the devail tion, caused by the war which then took place, scarcely one-half of the inclosed space was inhabited; the river which formerly flowed through the middle of the town, now ran on the outfide of the part occupied by buildings, and the citadel was at a great diffance from these. Six miles from the city stood the famous temple of Juno Lacinia, more universally celebrated than the city itself, and held in high veneration by all the furrounding nations. Here, a confecrated grove, encompassed on the extremities by close-ranged trees and tall firs, comprehended in the middle a tract of rich pasture ground, in which cattle of every kind, facred to the goddess, fed, without any keeper, the herds of each particular kind going out feparately, and returning at night to their stalls, without ever receiving injury, either from wild beafts, or men. The profits, therefore, accruing from these cattle were great, out of which.

which, a pillar of folid gold was erected and confe- BOOK crated, to that the fane became as remarkable for riches as for fanctity. Several miracles are also Y.R.537. attributed to it, as they generally are to fuch re- B.C.215. markable places: it is faid, that there is an altar in the porch of the temple, the ashes on which are never moved by any wind. The citadel of Croto, hanging over the fea on one fide, and on the other facing the country, had originally no other defence than its natural fituation; afterwards a wall was added, inclosing a place, through which Dionysius, tyrant of Sicily, effecting a passage over some rocks, at the back part, had taken it by furprise. fort thus fituate, and deemed fufficiently fecure. was held by the nobles, while the plebeians of Croto, in conjunction with the Bruttians, carried on the siege against them. After a considerable time, perceiving that the place was too strong to be reduced by their own force, they yielded to neceffity, and implored the affiftance of Hanno. Hanno endeavoured to prevail on the Crotonians to furrender, allowing a colony of Bruttians to be fettled among them; fo that their city, wasted and depopulated by wars, might recover its former populous state; but not one of the whole number, excepting Aristomachus, would listen to the proposal; they declared warmly, that " they would rather die, than, by ad-" mitting Bruttians into their fociety, be obliged to 46 adopt foreign rites, manners, laws, and, in time; even a foreign language." Aristomachus, unable by perfuafions to bring about a furrender, and finding no opportunity of betraying the citadel, as he had betrayed the town, left the place and went over to Hanno. Soon after this, ambassadors from Locri going, with Hanno's permission, into the citadel, used many arguments to prevail on them to suffer themselves to be removed to Locri, and not to resolve on hazarding the last extremities. This de-

fign

Y.R.537.

BOOK fign they had already got leave to execute from XXIV. Hannibal himself, having sent deputies to that with him in person. Accordingly Croto was evacuated, B.C. 215. and the inhabitants, being conducted to the fea, went on board ships. The whole body of the people removed to Locri. In Apulia, even the winter did not produce a suspension of hostilities between the Romans and Hannibal. The conful Sempronius had his winter-quarters at Luceria; Hannibal his near Arpi. Several flight engagements passed between their troops, in consequence of opportunities offering, or of one or the other party gaining an occasional advantage; and by these, the Roman foldiery were improved, and rendered daily more cautious and guarded against the enemy's stratagems.

> IV. In Sicily, the whole course of affairs took a turn unfavourable to the Romans, in consequence of the death of Hiero, and of the kingdom devolving on his grandson Hieronymus, a boy, in whom there was originally no room to expect moderation of conduct, much less, on his being invested with absolute power. His guardians and friends were happy in finding him of fuch a disposition, as they could hurry, at once, into every kind of vice. It is faid that Hiero, forefeeing that this would be the case, had, in the last stage of his life, formed an intention of leaving Syracuse free, lest the fovereignty, which had been acquired and eftablished by honourable means, should, under the tyrannical administration of a boy, be destroyed through folly and extravagance. This defign his daughters opposed strenuously, because they expected, that, while Hieronymus enjoyed the title of king, the whole administration of affairs would rest in them and their husbands, Andranodorus and Zoippus, for these were left the principal among his guardians. It was no easy matter for a man, now in his ninetieth year, and befet night and day, by BOOK the infigurating wiles of women, to keep his judg- XXIV. ment at liberty, and to regulate his domestic concerns by the standard of public utility. He, there-B.C. 215. fore, only took the precaution of fetting fifteen guardians over his grandson; and these he intreated, in his dying moments, to maintain inviolate the alliance with the Roman people, which he had religiously observed through a course of fifty years; to direct their endeavours principally to the making the boy tread in his steps, and pursue the maxims inculcated in his education: after giving these charges, he expired, and the governors quitted him. The will was then produced, and the prince, now about fifteen years old, was brought before the people in affembly, on which a few, who had been placed in different parts of the crowd for the purpole of raising acclamations, signified their approbation of the will; while the rest, affected as if they had lost their parent, dreaded all things, in a state thus bereft of its protector. The King's funeral was next performed, and, more through the love and affection of his fubjects, than any care of his relations, was numerously attended. In a little time after, Andranodorus displaced the other guardians, afferting that Hieronymus had attained to the years of manhood, and was capable of holding the government; and, by thus refigning the guardianship, which he held in common with many, he collected in himself singly the power of them all.

V. Scarcely would even a good and moderate prince, fucceeding one so highly beloved as Hiero, have found it easy to acquire the affections of the But Hieronymus, as if he meant, by Syraculans. his own faults, to excite grief for the loss of his grandfather, demonstrated, immediately on his first appearance, how great an alteration had taken place in every particular. For the people, who had

BOOK had for so many years seen Hiero, and his son XXIV. Gilon, no way differing from the rest of the citizens, either in the fashion of their dress or any other Y.R. 537. mark of distinction, now beheld purple and a diadem; armed guards, and the King sometimes issuing from his palace, as the tyrant Dionysius used to do, in a chariot drawn by four white horses. This affuming pride in equipage and shew naturally exposed him to universal contempt; besides which he shewed a disdainful carriage when addressed, and rudeness in answering; generally resused access, not only to strangers, but even to his guardians, and debased himself by lusts of uncommon kinds and inhuman cruelty. Such great terror therefore possessed all men, that, of his household, some had recourse to flight, others to a voluntary death, to avoid the fufferings which they apprehended. Two of the former, Andranodorus and Zoippus, the fonsin-law of Hiero, and a man named Thraso, were the only persons permitted to enter his house with any degree of familiarity; and though not much listened to on other subjects, yet when they argued, Andranodorus and Zoippus for taking part with the Carthaginians, and Thraso for maintaining the alliance with the Romans, they fometimes, by the warmth and earnestness of their disputes, artracted the young man's attention. While matters were in this fituation, a fervant who was of the fame age with Hieronymus, and had, from childhood, enjoyed the privileges of perfect familiarity with him, brought information of a plot formed against his life. The informer could name only one of the confpirators, Theodotus, by whom himself had been founded on the subject. This man being instantly feized, and delivered to Andranodorus to be put to the torture, without hesitation confessed himfelf guilty, but still concealed his accomplices. last, being racked, beyond what human patience could indure, he pretended to be overcome by his BOOK fuffering; but, instead of making discovery of the XXIV. plotters, he pointed his informations against persons Y.R. 537. who had no concern in the business, telling a B.C. 215. feigned stary, that Thraso was the author of the conspiracy, and that the others would never have entered on any attempt of fuch importance, had they not been induced to it by their trust in so powerful a leader; naming, at the same time, those who, while he framed his account in the intervals between his agonies and groans, occurred to him as the most worthless among Hieronymus's intimates. The mention of Thraso, beyond every other circumstance, made the tyrant think the information deferving of belief. He was therefore instantly configned to punishment, and the rest, who had been named equally guiltless of the crime, underwent the like fate. Not one of the conspirators, though their aflociate in the plot was kept for a long time under the torture, either concealed himself or fled: fo great was their confidence in the fortitude and fidelity of Theodotus; and which, indeed, were fully approved in him.

VI. The only bond which preferved the connexion with Rome being now diffolved by the removal of Thraso, immediately there appeared a manifest intention of fiding with the opposite party. Ambassadors were dispatched to Hannibal, who sent back a young man of noble birth, called Hannibal, and with him Hippocrates and Epicydes, who were born at Carthage, but derived their extraction originally from Syracuse, whence their grandfather had been banished; by the mother's fide, they were Carthaginians. By their means, a treaty was formed between Hannibal and the tyrant of Syracuse; and, with the approbation of the Carthaginian, they remained with the latter. The prætor, Appius Claudius, whose province Sicily was, on being acquainted

BOOK acquainted with these transactions, sent, immediately. XXIV. ambassadors to Hieronymus, who, telling him that they were come to renew the alliance which had fub-Y.R. 537. fifted with his grandfather, were heard and difmiffed with derifion; Hieronymus asking them, with a fneer, "what had been the event of the battle of " Cannæ? for Hannibal's ambaffadors told things " fcarcely credible. He wished," he faid, "to know " the truth, that he might thereby determine which " fide offered the fairest prospect to his choice." The Romans told him, that, when he began to listen to embassies with semiousness, they would return to Syracuse; and, after admonishing, rather than requesting him, not to violate faith rashly, they departed. Hieronymus dispatched commissioners to Carthage, to conclude an alliance conformable to the treaty with Hannibal; and it was finally agreed, that when they should have expelled the Romans from Sicily, which, he faid, would speedily be effected if they fent ships and an army, the river Himera, which nearly divides the island into two parts, should be the boundary between the dominions of Syracuse and those of Carthage. Afterwards, puffed up by the flatteries of people who defired him to remember, not only Hiero, but also his grandfather on his mother's fide, King Pyrrhus, he fent another embaffy, reprefenting that he thought it reasonable that Sicily should be entirely ceded to him. and that the dominion of Italy should be acquired for the people of Carthage, as an empire of their own. This fickleness and unsteadiness of mind, they, confidering him as a hot-brained youth, did not wonder at; nor did they enter into any dispute on it, content with detaching him from the party of the Romans.

> VII. But, on his fide, every circumstance concurred to precipitate his ruin; for, after fending before him Hippocrates and Epicydes with two thousand foldiers.

foldiers, to endeavour to get possession of those BOOK cities which were held by Roman garrisons, he himfelf, with all the rest of his forces, amounting to Y.R. 537. fifteen thousand horse and foot, marched to Leontini. B.C. 215. Here the conspirators, every one of whom happened to be in the army, posted themselves in an uninhabited house, standing in a narrow lane, through which Hieronymus used to pass to the Forum. While the rest stood here, armed and prepared for action, waiting for his coming up, one of their number, whose name was Dinomenes, and being of the body-guards. had it in charge, that, as foon as the King drew near the door, he should, on some pretence, in the narrow pass, stop the crowd behind from advancing. All was executed as had been concerted. Dinomenes, by stretching out his foot, as if to loosen a knot which was too tight, arrested the people, and occasioned such an opening, that the King, being attacked as he was passing by without his armed followers, was pierced with feveral wounds, before affistance could be given him. Some, on hearing the shout and tumult, discharged their weapons at Dinomenes, who now openly opposed their passing; notwithstanding which he escaped with only two However, feeing the King stretched on the ground, they betook themselves to slight. the conspirators, some repaired to the Forum to the populace, who were overjoyed at the recovery of liberty; others proceeded to Syracuse, to take the requifite precautions against the purposes of Andranodorus and other partifans of the King. Affairs being in this unsettled state, Appius Claudius, when he observed the storm gathering in his neighbourhood, informed the fenate by letter, that all Sicily favoured the people of Carthage and Hannibal. On his part, in order to counteract the defigns of the Syracufans, he drew all his troops to the frontiers between that kingdom and his own province. Towards the close of this year, Quintus Fabius, by 0 3

Y.R.537

BOOK direction of the senate, fortified Puteoli, which, during the war, began to be much frequented as a place of trade, and placed a garrison in it. Going thence to Rome to hold the elections, he issued a proclamation for the assembly, on the first day on which it could properly meet; and, passing by the city without stopping, went down to the field of Mars. On this day, the lot of giving the first vote fell to a younger century of the Anien tribe, and this having nominated Titus Otacilius and Marcus Æmilius Regillus confuls, Quintus Fabius commanded filence, and spoke to this effect:

> VIII. " If either we had peace in Italy, or had " to deal with fuch an enemy as would allow of " any remissings on our fide, I should deem that " man deficient in proper respect to your indeef pendent rights, who attempted to throw any ob-" stacle in the way of those inclinations, which you " bring with you into the field of election, with the " purpose of conferring the high offices of the state " on persons of your own choice. But when you " confider that the prefent war is of fuch a nature. " and the conduct of our prefent enemy fuch, that " none of our commanders has ever committed an " error which has not been followed by most dif-" astrous consequences, it believes you to come " hither to give your full ages with the fame care-" ful circumspection with which you go out in arms " to the field of battle; and every one ought thus " to fay to himfelf: 'I am to nominate a conful qua-" lifted to vie with Hannibal in the art of war." "the prefent year, at Capua, on the challenge " of Jubellius Taurca, the completest horseman " among the Campanians, we fent against him "Claudius Afellus, the completest horseman among "the Romans. Against a Gaul, who at a former " time pronounced a challenge on the bridge of the 66 Anio, our ancestors sent Titus Manlius, a man " abundantly

" abundantly furnished both with strength and cou-BOOK " rage. I cannot deny that there was the fame rea. XXIV. "fon for placing every degree of confidence, a few Y.R.537-" years after, in Marcus Valerius, when he took B.C. 215. " arms for the combat against a Gaul who gave " a fimilar defiance. Now, as, in felecting foot 66 foldiers and horsemen, we endeavour to find such " as are superior, or, if that cannot be effected, " equal in strength to their antagonists; let us, in " like manner, look out for a commander equal "to the general of the enemy. When we shall 46 have chosen the man of the most consummate " abilities in the nation, yet still, being elected at " the moment, and appointed but for one year, he " will be matched against another invested with a " command of long and uninterrupted continu-" ance, not confined by any narrow limitations either " of time or of authority, or which might hinder " him to conduct and execute every measure ac-" cording to the exigencies of the war; whereas "with us, before we have well completed our pre-" paratory operations, and when we are just entering " on business, our year expires. I need say no more concerning the qualifications of the persons whom " you ought to elect conful; I shall therefore only " add a few observations respecting those whom the " prerogative century has made the objects of its " favour. Marcus Æmilius Regillus is flamen of "Quirinus, consequently we could neither send 44 him abroad from his facred employment, nor " keep him at home, without neglecting, in one " case, the business of the war, or in the other, that " of religion. Otacilius is married to a daughter of " my fifter, and has children by her. Nevertheless, " I am too fensible of the obligations which I and " my ancestors owe to your kindness, not to prefer "the interest of the public to that of any private " connexions. In a calm fea, any mariner, even a " passenger, can steer the vessel; but when a furious

0 4

BOOK " storm arises, putting the sea into violent agitation, XXIV. " and the ship is hurried away by the tempest, then " a pilot of skill and resolution becomes necessary. Y.R.537 "We fail not in a calm, but have already been very " near foundering in feveral storms; you must, 66 therefore, be careful to use the utmost prudence " and caution with respect to the person whom you " place at the helm. Titus Otacilius, we have had " a trial of you in a less important business: you " gave us no proof that we ought to confide in you " for the management of affairs of greater moment. "We fitted out, this year, a fleet, of which you 66 had the command, for three purposes; to ravage " the coast of Africa, to secure our own coasts of "Italy, and, principally, to prevent reinforcements " with money and provisions being transmitted from " Carthage to Hannibal. If he has performed for "the public, I do not fay all, but any one of these " fervices, create Titus Otacilius conful. " on the contrary, while you held the command of " the fleet, every thing came to Hannibal fafe and " untouched, as if he had no enemy on the fea; " if the coast of Italy has been more infested this 66 year than that of Africa, what reason can you " offer, why people should pitch on you in particu-" lar to oppose such a commander as Hannibal? " you were conful, we should judge it requisite to " have a dictator nominated according to the prac-"tice of our forefathers. Nor could you take " offence at its being thought that there was, in the Roman nation, some one superior to you in the art of war. It concerns no man's interest more than " your own, Titus Otacilius, that there be not laid " on your shoulders a burthen, under which you "would fink. I earnestly recommend, then, Ro-" mans, that, guided by the fame fentiments which " would influence you, if while you stood armed for  battle you were fuddenly called on to choose two commanders, under whose conduct and auspices . 6 " you to join the colours, and under whose care and B.C. 215. "direction they are to wage war. The lake Thrasi-"menus and Cannæ, examples melancholy in the " recollection, are, nevertheless, useful warnings to " guard against the like. Crier, call back the " younger Anien century to vote."

" you were to fight, you would proceed this day in BOOK "the election of confuls, to whom your children XXIV. are to swear obedience, at whose order they are Y.R.537.

IX. Otacilius now exclaiming with great heat, that the defign of Fabius was to be continued in the confulship, and becoming very obstreperous, the conful ordered his lictors to advance to him; and, as he had not entered the city, but had gone directly, without halting, into the field of Mars, he put him in mind that the axes were carried in his fasces. The prerogative century proceeded a fecond time to vote, and chose consuls, Quintus Fabius Maximus, a fourth time, and Marcus Marcellus, a third time. The other centuries, without any variation, named the fame. One prætor was likewise re-elected, Quintus Fulvius Flaccus. The other three chosen were new ones, Titus Otacilius Craffus, a fecond time, Quintus Fabius, the conful's fon, who was at the time curule ædile, and Publius Cornelius Lentulus. The election of prætors being over, a decree of the fenate was passed, that "Rome should, out " of course, be the province of Quintus Fulvius; 46 and that he in particular should hold the command in the city, when the confuls should go abroad " to the campaign." Twice in this year happenedgreat floods, and the Tiber overflowed the country, with great demolition of houses and destruction of men and cattle. In the fifth year of the fecond Y.R.538. Punic war, Quintus Fabius Maximus, a fourth, B.C. 214. and Marcus Marcellus, a third time, entering together into the confulship, attracted the notice of the public in an unufual degree; for, during many years,

BOOK years, there had not been two fuch confuls. The XXIV. old men observed, that thus had Maximus Rullus Y.R. 538. and Publius Decius been declared confuls, in the B.C.214. time of the Gallic war; and thus, afterwards, Papirius and Carvilius, against the Samnites, Bruttians, Lucanians, and Tarentines. Marcellus was chosen conful in his absence, being at the time with the army, and the office was continued to Fabius, who was on the fpot, and prefided in person at the election. The state of the times, the exigencies of the war, and the danger threatening the very being of the state, hindered the people from examining the precedent strictly, neither did they suspect the conful of ambition for command; on the contrary, they rather applauded his greatness of foul, because, knowing that the state stood in need of a general of the highest abilities, and that he himself was unquestionably the person so qualified, he had made light of any public centure which he might incur on the occasion, in comparison with the interest of the commonwealth.

> X. On the day of the confuls entering on their office, a meeting of the fenate was held in the Capitol, in which it was decreed, first, that the consuls fhould cast lots, or settle between themselves, which of them should, before his setting out for the army, hold the affembly for the appointment of cenfors. Then all those who were at the head of armies were continued in authority, and ordered to remain in the provinces: Tiberius Gracchus at Luceria. where he was with an army of volunteer flaves: Caius Terentius Varro in the Picenian, and Manius Pomponius in the Gallic territories. Of the prætors of the preceding year, Quintus Mucius was ordered, in quality of pro-prætor, to hold the government of Sardinia, and Marcus Valerius to command on the fea-coast near Brundusium, watching attentively, and guarding against any motion which might be lius Cornelius Lentulus, the province of Sicily was XXIV. decreed, and to Titus Otacilius the same sleet which Y.R. 538. he had commanded the year before against the Car- B.C. 214. thaginians. Numerous prodigies were reported to have happened this year; and the more these were credited by fimple and fuperstitious people, the more fuch stories multiplied: that at Lanuvium crows had built their nest in the inside of the temple of Juno Sospita; in Apulia, a green palm-tree took fire; at Mantua, a stagnating piece of water, caused by the overflowing of the river Mincius, appeared as of blood; at Cales, a shower of chalk; and, in the cattle-market at Rome, one of blood fell in the Istrian street; a fountain under ground burst out in fuch an impetuous stream, as to roll and carry off jars and casks which were in the place, like a violent flood; lightning tell on the public court-house, in the Capitol, the temple of Vulcan in the field of Mars, a nut-tree in the country of the Sabines, and a public road, a wall and a gate at Gabii. Other stories of miracles were already spread about; that the spear of Mars at Præneste moved forward of its own accord; that an ox spoke in Sicily; that an infant in the mother's womb, in the country of the Marucinians, had called out, "Io, Triumphe!" at Spoletum a woman was transformed into a man, and at Adria an altar was feen in the sky, and round it figures of men in white garments. Nay even in the city of Rome itself, besides a swarm of bees being feen in the Forum, feveral persons, affirming that they faw armed legions on the Janiculum, roused the citizens to arms; when those who were at the time on the Janiculum afferted, that no person had appeared there except the usual inhabitants of that hill. I hese prodigies were expiated, conformably to the answers of the Aruspices, by victims of the greater kinds, and supplication was ordered to be performed to all the deities who had shrines at Rome.

XI. Having

BOOK Y.R. 538.

XI. Having finished the ceremonies enjoined XXIV. for conciliating the favour of the gods, the confuls proposed to the senate, to take into consideration the state of the nation, the management of the war, the number of forces to be employed, and the places where the feveral divisions were to act. It was refolved that eighteen legions should be employed against the enemy; that each of the consuls should take two to himself; that two should be employed in the defence of the provinces of Gaul, Sicily, and Sardinia; that Quintus Fabius, prætor, should have two under his command in Apulia, and Tiberius Gracchus two of volunteer flaves in the country about Luceria; that one should be left to Caius Terentius, pro-conful, for Picenum, one to Marcus Valerius for the fleet at Brundusium, and that two should garrison the city. In order to fill up this number of legions, it was necessary to levy fix new ones, which the confuls were ordered to raise as soon as possible; and, at the same time, to fit out an additional number of ships; so that, including those which were stationed on the coasts of Calabria, the fleet should, this year, consist of an hundred and fifty ships of war. The levy being finished, and the new vessels launched, Quintus Fabius held an affembly for the appointment of cenfors, when Marcus Atilius Regulus and Publius Furius Philus were elected. A rumour spreading, that war had broke out in Sicily, Titus Otacilius was ordered to proceed thither with his fleet; and there being a fearcity of feamen, the confuls, in pursuance of a decree of the fenate, published a proclamation, that every person, who in the censorship of Lucius Æmilius and Caius Flaminius had been rated, or whose father had been rated at fifty thousand affer of brass*, or, from that fum, up to one hundred thousand t, or had fince acquired such a property, should furnish one seaman with pay for six months; BOOK every one rated from an hundred thousand, up to three hundred thousand*, three seamen, with pay for a year; every one rated from three hundred thoufand, up to one million t, five feamen; every one rated higher, feven; and that fenators should provide eight feamen each, with pay for a year. seamen furnished in obedience to this ordinance, being armed and equipped by their owners, went on board the ships, with provisions ready dressed This was the first instance of a for thirty days. Roman fleet being manned at the expence of private persons.

^{* 161}l. 98. 2d.

XII. These preparations, so unusually great, raised fears among the Campanians in particular, left the Romans should begin the campaign with the siege They fent ambaffadors, therefore, to Hannibal, entreating him to march his army to that place: acquainting him, that "the Romans were "raifing new armies for the purpose of laying siege " to it, for there was no city against which they were " more highly incenfed, for having deferted their " party." As this message, and the manner in which it was delivered, intimated fuch strong apprehensions, Hannibal thought it advisable to proceed with dispatch, lest the Romans might be beforehand with him; whereupon, leaving Arpi, he took possession of his old camp on the Tifata over Capua. Then leaving the Numidians and Spaniards for the defence both of the camp and the city, he marched away with the rest of his forces to the lake of Avernus, under the pretence of performing facrifice, but in reality with a defign to make an attempt on Puteoli and the garrifon there. As foon as Maximus received intelligence that Hannibal had departed from Arpi and was returning into Campania, he

^{* 1,8661. 148}

BOOK hastened back to his army, without hasting either night or day, fending orders to Tiberius Gracchus, to Y.R. 538. bring forward his forces from Luceria to Beneventum, B.C. 214. and to the prætor Quintus Fabius, fon to the conful, to hasten to Luceria, in the place of Gracebus. At the same time, the two prætors set out for Sicily, Publius Cornelius to command the army, Otacilius the fleet on the fea-coast. The rest also departed to their respective provinces, and those who were continued in command remained in the same districts where they had been in the former year.

> XIII. While Hannibal was at the lake Avernus, there came to him, from Tarentum, five young men of quality, who had been made prisoners, some at the lake Trafimenus, some at Cannæ, and who had been fent home with that generofity which the Carthaginian shewed towards all the allies of the Romans: thele told him, that "out of gratitude " for his kind treatment, they had perfuaded a " great number of the Taientine youth to prefer " his alliance and friendship to that of the Romans; and that they had been fent as deputies " by their countrymen, to request that Hannibal " would draw his army nearer to Tarentum; that "if his standards and his camp were once-seen from that place, the city would, without any delay, be delivered into his hands; for the commons were under the influence of the younger " men, and the management of public affairs was with the commons." Hannibal, after highly commending and loading them with a profusion of promises, defired them to return home in order to bring the scheme to maturity, saying, that he would be there in due time. With these hopes the Tarentines were dismissed. Hannibal had, before their application, conceived an ardent wish to gain possession of Tarentum; he saw that it was a city not only opulent and of great note, but likewise a fea-

Hav- B.C. 214.

fea-port, commodiously situated, opposite Macedonia; BOOK and that King Philip, should he pass over into Italy, would steer his course to that harbour, because the Y.R. 538. Romans were in possession of Brundusium. ing performed the sacrifice which he had proposed at his coming, and having, during his stay, utterly laid waste the lands of Cumæ, as far as to the promontory of Misenum, he changed his route suddealy to Puteoli, with defign to furprise the Roman garrison. This confifted of fix thousand men, and the place was fecured, not only by the nature of its fituation, but by strong works. Here Hannibal delayed three days, and attempted the garrison on every quarter; but, finding no prospect of success, he marched forward to ravage the territory of Neapolis, rather for the fake of gratifying his refentment, than with any hope of becoming mafter of the town. By his arrival in the neighbourhood, the commons of Nola were encouraged to stir, having for a long time been disaffected to the cause of the Romans, and harbouring, at the fame time, refentment against their own fenate. Deputies therefore came to invite Hannibal, with a positive promise to deliver the city into his hands: but the conful Marcellus, whom the nobles folicited, by his expeditious meafures prevented the defign from taking place. he made a march from Cales to Suessula, though he met with fome delay in passing the river Vulturnus; and from thence, on the enfuing night, introduced into Nola fix thousand foot and three hundred horse, to support the senate. While every precaution requisite for securing the possession of Nola was thus used by the conful with vigorous dispatch, Hannibal, on the other fide, was dilatory in his proceedings; for, after having twice before been baffied in a project of the same kind, he was now the less inclined to credit the professions of the Nolans.

воок Y.R.538. B.C.214.

XIV. Meanwhile the conful, Quintus Fabius, set XXIV. out to attempt the recovery of Cafilinum, which was held by a Carthaginian garrison; and, at the same time, as if by concert, there arrived at Beneventum, on one fide, Hanno from Bruttium, with a large body of infantry and cavalry; and, on another, Tiberius Gracchus, from Luceria. The latter came first into the town; then, hearing that Hanno was encamped at the river Calor, about three miles distant, and that, by detachments from thence, devastations were committed on the country, he marched out his troops, pitched his camp about a mile from the enemy, and there held an affembly of his foldiers. The legions which he had with him confifted mostly of volunteer slaves, who had chosen rather to merit their liberty in filence, by the fervice of a fecond year, than to request it openly. He had observed, however, as he was leaving his winterquarters, that the troops, on their march, began to murmur, asking, whether "they were ever to serve " as free citizens?" He had, however, written to the fenate, infifting, not fo much on their wishes, as on their merits; declaring that "he had ever found "them faithful and brave in the fervice; and that, " excepting a free condition, they wanted no quali-"fication of complete foldiers." Authority was given him to act in that business, as he himself should judge conducive to the good of the public. Before he refolved upon coming to an engagement, therefore, he gave public notice, that " the time was " now come, when they might obtain the liberty " which they had fo long wished for. That he in-"tended, next day, to engage the enemy in regular " battle, in a clear and open plain, where, without " any fear of stratagems, the business might be de-" cided by the mere dint of valour. Every man "then, who should bring home the head of an " enemy, he would, instantly, by his own authority, " fet free; and every one, who should retreat from his " post, es post, he would punish in the same manner as BOOK a flave Every man's lot now depended on his XXIV. own exertion; and, as fecurity for their obtaining Y.R 538. their freedom, not only he himself stood pledged, BC, 214. 66 but the conful Marcellus, and even the whole fenate, who, having been confulted by him on " the subject of their freedom, had authorized him " to determine in the case." He then read the conful's letter and the decree of the fenate, on which an universal shout of joy was raised. They eagerly demanded the fight, and ardently preffed him to give the fignal instantly. Gracchus gave notice that they should be gratified on the following day, and then difmiffed the affembly. The foldiers, exulting with joy, especially those who were to receive liberty as the price of their active efforts for one day, spent the rest of their time until night in getting their arms in readiness.

XV. Next day, as foon as the trumpets began to found to battle, the above-mentioned men, the first of all, affembled round the general's quarters, ready and marshalled for the fight. At funrise Gracchus led out his troops to the field, nor did the enemy hesitate to meet him. Their force consisted of seventeen thousand foot, mostly Bruttians and Lucanians, and twelve thousand horse, among whom were very few Italians, almost all the rest were Numidians and Moors. The conflict was fierce and long; during four hours neither fide gained any advantage, and no circumstance proved a greater impediment to the fuccess of the Romans, than from the heads of the enemy being made the price of liberty; for when any had valiantly flain an opponent, he lost time, first, in cutting off the head, which could not be readily effected in the midst of the crowd and tumult. and then his right hand being employed in fecuring it, the bravest ceased to take a part in the fight, and the contest devolved on the inactive and dastardly.

P

XXIV. Y.R.538. B.C. 214.

BOOK The military tribunes now represented to Gracchus, that the foldiers were not employed in wounding any of the enemy who stood on their legs, but in maiming those who had fallen, and instead of their own fwords in their right hands, they carried the heads of the flain. On which he commanded them to give orders with all haste, that "they should throw away " the heads, and attack the enemy: that their courage " was fufficiently evident and conspicuous, and that " fuch brave men need not doubt of liberty." The fight was then revived, and the cavalry also were ordered to charge: these were briskly encountered by the Numidians, and the battle of the horse was maintained with no less vigour than that of the foot; fo that the event of the day again became doubtful, while the commanders, on both fides, vilified their adversaries in the most contemptuous terms, the Roman speaking to his soldiers of the Lucanians and Bruttians, as men so often defeated and subdued by their ancestors; and the Carthaginian, of the Romans, as flaves, foldiers taken out of the workhouse. At last Gracchus proclaimed, that his men had no room to hope for liberty, unless the enemy were routed that day, and driven off the field.

> XVI. These words so effectually inflamed their courage, that, as if they had been fuddenly transformed into other men, they renewed the shout, and bore down on the enemy with an impetuofity, which it was impossible longer to withstand. First the Carthaginian van-guard, then the battations were thrown into confusion; at last the whole line was forced to give way; they then plainly turned their backs, and fled precipitately into their camp, in fuch terror and dismay, that none of them made a stand, even at the gates or on the rampart; and the Romans following close, so as to form almost one body with them, began anew a fecond battle within their works. Here, as the fight was more impeded by the narrowness rownels of the place, so was the flaughter more BOOK dreadful, the prisoners also lending affistance, who, XXIV. during the confusion, fnatched up weapons, and Y R. 538. forming in a body, cut off numbers in the rear. So B.C. 214. great, therefore, was the carnage, that out of so large an army, scarcely two thousand men, most of whom were horsemen, escaped with their commander: all the rest were either slain or made prisoners; thirtyeight standards were taken. Of the victorious party, there fell about two thousand. All the booty was given up to the foldiers, except the prisoners, and fuch cattle as should be claimed by the owners within thirty days. When they returned into the camp, laden with spoil, about four thousand of the volunteer foldiers, who had fought with less spirit than the rest, and had not broken into the Carthaginian camp along with them, dreading punishment. withdrew to an eminence at a small distance. Next day they were brought down from thence by a military tribune, and arrived just as Gracchus was holding an affembly, which he had fummoned. Here the proconful, having, in the first place, honoured with military presents the veteran foldiers. according to the degree of courage and activity shewn by each in the fight, said, that "as to "what concerned the volunteers, he rather wished " that all in general, worthy and unworthy, should " receive commendations from him, than that any " should be reprimanded on such a day as that;" and then, praying that "it might prove advan-" tageous, happy, and fortunate to the common-" wealth and to themselves;" he pronounced them all free. On which declaration, in transports of joy, they raifed a general shout, and while they now embraced and congratulated each other, raising their hands towards heaven, and praying for every bleffing on the Roman people, and on Gracchus in particular, the proconful addressed them thus: "Be-" fore

P 2

BOOK " fore I had fet all on an equal footing of freedom, "I was unwilling to diftinguish any by a mark, " either of bravery or of cowardice. But now, Y.R.538. "fince I have acquitted the honour of government, B.C. 214. "lest every distinction between them be lost, I will " order the names of those who, conscious of being " remis in the action, have lately made a fecession, " to be laid before me; and, fummoning each, will " bind them by an oath, that, as long as they shall " ferve me in the army, they will never, except " obliged by fickness, take food or drink in any " other posture than standing. This penalty you "will undergo with patience, if you confider, that " your cowardice could not be more flightly " branded." He then gave the fignal of preparation for a march, and the foldiers, carrying and driving on their booty, returned to Beneventum fo chearful and fo gay, that they feemed to have come home from a feast, given on some remarkable occafion, rather than from a field of battle. Beneventans poured out in crowds to meet them at the gates, embraced the foldiers, congratulated them, and pressed them to come to their houses. They had already prepared entertainments in their inner courts, and intreated Gracchus to permit his foldiers to partake of the fame. Gracchus gave them leave, on condition that they should all dine in the public street: every thing was accordingly brought out before each person's door, where the volunteers dined with the caps of liberty, or white woollen fillets in their hands, some reclining, others standing, who, at the same time, attended the rest. This afforded a fight fo pleafing, that Gracchus, on his return to Rome, ordered a representation of that day's festival to be painted in the Temple of Liberty, which his father caused to be built on the Aventine, out of money accruing from fines, and which he afterwards dedicated.

XVII. While these transactions passed at Be-BOOK neventum, Hannibal, after ravaging the lands of XXIV. Neapolis, marched his army to Nola. The conful, Y.R. 538. as foon as he was apprized of his approach, fent B.C. 214. for the proprætor Pomponius, and the army which lay in the camp over Suesiula; being determined to go out, and not to decline an engagement with him. He fent Caius Claudius Nero with the main strength of the cavalry, in the dead of the night, through the gate which was distant from the enemy, ordering him to ride round fo as not to be observed, until he came behind their army, to follow them lesfurely as they moved, and as foon as he should perceive that the battle was begun, to advance on their rear. prevented Nero from executing these orders, whether mistake of the road, or the shortness of the time, is uncertain. Although the battle was fought while he was absent, yet the Romans had evidently the advantage; but by the cavalry not coming up in time, the plan of operations was disconcerted. Marcellus, not daring to follow the retiring foe, gave the fignal for retreat, while his men were purfuing their success. However, more than two thousand of the enemy are faid to have fallen that day; of the Romans less than four hundred. About funiet, Nero returned, after having to no purpose fatigued the men and horses through the whole day and night, without even getting a fight of the Carthaginian; he was very feverely reprimanded by the conful, who went fo far as to affirm, that he was the cause of their not having retorted on the enemy the difaster suffered at Cannæ. Next day the Roman army marched out to the field, but Hannibal, tacitly acknowledging his defeat, kept within his trenches. In the dead of the night of the third day, giving up all hope of getting possession of Nola, a project never attempted without loss, he marched away towards Tarentum, where he had a greater prospect of success.

B.C. 214.

BOOK XVIII. Nor did less spirit appear in the admi-XXIV. nistration of the Roman affairs at home, than in the Y.R. 538. field. The cenfors being, by the emptiness of the treasury, discharged from the care of erecting public works, turned their attention to the regulating of men's morals, and checking the growth of vices, which, like distempered bodies, ever apt to generate other maladies, had fprung up during the war. First they summoned before them those, who, after the battle of Cannæ, were faid to have formed the defign of deferting the commonwealth, and abandoning Italy. At the head of these was Lucius Cæcilius Metellus, who happened to be quæstor at the time. They then ordered him, and the others accused of the same criminal conduct, to plead to the charge; and as these could not clear themselves, they pronounced judgment, that those persons had made use of words and discourses, tending to the detriment of the commonwealth, inafmuch as they purported the forming of a conspiracy for the purpose of abandoning Italy. Next to these were summoned the over ingenious casuists, with respect to the means of diffolving the obligation of an oath, who fupposed, that by returning privately into Hannibal's camp, after having begun their journey with the rest of the prisoners, they should tulfil the oath which they had taken. Of these, and the others abovementioned, fuch as had horses at the public expence, were deprived of them, and they were all degraded from their tribes and disfranchised. Nor was the care of the cenfors confined merely to the regulating of the fenate and the equestrian order. They erased from the lists of the younger centuries, the names of all those who had not served as foldiers during the last four years, not having been regularly exempted from fervice, or prevented by fickness. These, in number above two thoufand, were disfranchifed, and all were degraded from their tribes. To this simple censorial sentence was added a fevere decree of the senate, that all BOOK those whom the censors had degraded should serve XXIV. as foot foldiers, and be fent into Sicily, to join Y.R. 538. the remains of the army of Cannæ; the time B.C. 2140 limited for the fervice of foldiers of this description being, until the enemy should be driven out of Italy. While the cenfors now, on account of the impoverished treasury, declined contracting for the repairs of the facred edifices, the furnishing of horses to the curule magistrates, and other matters of like nature, a great number of those, who had been accustomed to engage in contracts of the kind, waited on them, and recommended that they " transact every kind of business, and en-" gage in contracts, in the fame manner as if "there were money in the coffers; affuring them, "that no one would call on the treasury for pay-" ment, until the conclusion of the war." wards came the former owners of those whom Tiberius Sempronius had made free at Beneventum; who faid, that they had been fent for by the public bankers, in order that they might receive the price of their flaves; but that they did not defire it until the war should be at an end. When this disposition to support the credit of the treasury appeared among the plebeian class, the property belonging to minors, and of widows, began to be brought in; the people believing that they could not deposit it any where in greater security, or with more religious regard to their trust, than under the public faith: and when any thing was bought, or laid in for the use of the said minors or widows, a bill was given for it on the quæstor. This generous zeal of the private ranks spread from the city into the camp, where no horieman, no centurion, would take his pay; and should any have received it, the others would have cenfured them as mercenary.

216

BOOK B.C. 214.

XIX. The conful, Quintus Fabius, lay encamped XXIV. before Cafilinum, which was defended by a garrifon of two thousand Campanians, and seven hundred of Hannibal's foldiers. The commander was Statius Metius, fent thither by Cneius Magius Atellanus, who was chief magistrate that year, and was now employed in arming the populace and the flaves promiscuously, intending to attack the Roman camp while the conful was laying siege to the place. None of his defigns escaped the knowledge of Fabius, who therefore fent a message to his colleague at Nola, that, " while the fiege of Casilinu " was carried on, there was a necessity for another " army to oppose the Campanians; that either " he himself should come, leaving a moderate " garrison at Nola, or, if affairs there required " his stay, from not yet being in a state of securny " against the attempts of Hannibal, he should " in that case send for the proconsul, Tiberius " Gracchus, from Beneventum." On receiving this message, Marcellus, leaving two thousand men to garrison Nola, came with the rest of his army to Casilinum, and, by his arrival, the Campanians, who were on the point of breaking out into action, were kept quiet. And now the two confuls, with united forces, pushed on the siege. But the Roman foldiers, in their rash approaches to the wails, receiving many wounds, and meeting little fuccels in any of their attempts, Quintus Fabius gave his opinion, that they ought to abandon an enterprife which, though of flight importance, attended with as much difficulty as one of great consequence; and that they should retire from the place, especially as more momentous business called for their attention. Marcellus prevented their quitting the fiege with disappointment, urging, that there were many enterprises of such a nature, that, as they ought not to be undertaken by great generals, fo when once engaged in they ought not not to be relinquished, because the reputation either BOOK of fuccess or of failure, must be productive of weighty XXIV. consequences. All kinds of works were then con- Y.R.538. ftructed, and machines of every description pushed B.C. 214. forward to the walls. On this, the Campanians requested of Fabius that they might be allowed to retire in fafety to Capua, when, a few having come out of the town, Marcellus feized on the pass by which they came, and immediately a promiscuous flaughter began near the gate, and foon after, on the roops rushing in, it spread through the city. About . tifiy of the Campanians, who first left the place, ran for refuge to Fabius, and under his protection escaped to Capua. Thus was Casilinum taken by furprite, during the conferences and delays of those who went to negociate terms of capitulation. The prisoners, both Campanians and Hannibal's foldiers, were tent to Rome, and there thut up in prition, and the multitude of the towns-people were difperfed among the neighbouring states, to be kept in custody.

XX. At the same time, when the army, after effecting their purpose, removed from Casilinum, Gracchus, who was in Lucania, detached, under a præfect of the allies, feveral cohorts, which had been raised in that country, to ravage the lands of the enemy. These Hanno attacked while they straggled in a careless manner, and retaliated a blow ain.oft as fevere as that which he had received at beneventum; then, to avoid being overtaken by fracchus, he retired with the utmost speed into Bruttium. As to the confuls, Marcellus returned to Nola, whence he had come; Fabius proceeded into Samnium, in order to overrun the country, and recover, by force, the cities which had revolted. The Samnites of Caudium fuffered the most grievous devastations; their territory was laid waste with fire to a great extent, and men and cattle were carried

BOOK off as spoil. The following towns were taken from XXIV. them by affault: Combulteria, Telefia, Compfa, Melæ, Fulfulæ, and Orbitanium; from the Luca-Y.R. 538. nians, Blandæ; Æcæ, belonging to the Apulians, B.C. 214. was taken after a fiege. In these towns twentyfive thousand were taken or flain, and three hundred and feventy deferters retaken; thefe, being fent by the conful to Rome, were all beaten with rods in the Comitium, and cast down from the rock. All this was performed by Fabius in the course of a few days. Bad health confined Marcellus at Nola, and prevented his taking the field. At the fame time the prætor, Quintus Fabius, whose province was the country round Luceiia, took by storm a town called Accua, and fortified a strong camp near Ardonea. While the Romans were thus employed in various places, Hannibal had arrived at Tarentum, after utterly destroying every thing in his way. At last, when he entered the territory of Tarentum, his troops began to march in a peaceable manner: nothing was injured there, nor did any ever go out of the road; this proceeding flowed manifeltly not from the moderation either of the foldiers or their commander, but from a wish to acquire the esteem of the Tarentines. However, after he had advanced almost close to the walls, finding no commotion raifed in his favour, an event which he expected to happen on the fight of his van-guard, he encamped about the distance of a mile from the town. Three days before Hannibal's approach, Marcus Livius being fent by the proprætor, Marcus Valerius, commander of the fleet at Brundusium, had formed the young nobility of Tarentum into bodies; and, posting guards at every gate, and along the walls, wherever there was occasion, by his unremitting vigilance both by day, and more particularly by night, left no room for any attempt, either of the enemy or of the wavering allies. Wherefore, after many days were spent there to no purpose, Hannibal, Hannibal, finding that none of those who had at BOOK tended him at the lake Avernus either came them. XXIV. felves or fent any message or letter, and perceiving Y.R 538. that he inconfiderately suffered himself to be led by B.C. 214. delufive promifes, decamped and withdrew. He did not even then do any injury to their country, for though his counterfeited tenderness had brought him no advantage, yet he still entertained hopes of prevailing on them to renounce their prefent engagements. When he came to Salapia he collected there stores of corn from the lands of Metapontum and Heraclea, for midfummer was now past, and the place appeared commodious for winter-quarters. hence he fent out the Moors and Numidians to plunder the territory of Sallentum, and the nearest woody parts of Apulia, where not much booty was found of any other kind than horses, several study of which made the principal part of their acquisitions; of these, four thousand were distributed among the horsemen to be trained.

XXI. The Romans, feeing that a war of no flight moment was ready to break out in Sicily, and that the death of the tyrant had only given the Syracufans enterprifing leaders, without working any change in their principles or tempers, decreed that province to the conful Marcus Marcellus. Immediately after the murder of Hieronymus, the foldiers in Leontini had raifed a tumult, furioufly exclaiming, that the death of the king should be expiated by the blood of the conspirators. Afterwards, the words LIBERTY RESTORED, a found ever delightful to the ear, being frequently repeated, and hopes being held out of largesses from the royal treasure, of serving under better generals, mention at the fame time being made of the tyrant's shocking crimes, and more shocking lusts; all these together produced fuch an alteration in their fentiments, that they fuffered the body of the king, whom just now they had fo violently lamented, to lie without burial.

Y.R.538. B C.214.

BOOK " people, to open the gates of the island, and with-XXIV. " draw the garrison. If he meant, under the pretext " of being guardian of the fovereignty for another, " to usurp it into his own hands, he recommended it " to them to recover their liberty by much keener " exertions than had been shewn against Hierony-" mus." Accordingly, on the breaking up of the affembly, deputies were fent. The meetings of the fenate were now revived; for though it had, during the reign of Hiero, continued to act as the public council of the state, yet fince his death, until now, it had never been convened, or confulted on any bufiness. When the commissioners came to Andranodorus, he was much moved by the united voice of his countrymen, by their being in possession of the other quarters of the city, and moreover by that division of the island, which was the strongest, being lost to him, and in the hands of the other party. But his wife, Demarata, daughter of Hiero, still swelling with royal arrogance and female pride, reminded him of an expreffion frequently uttered by Dionysius the Tyrant, who used to fay, that "a man ought to relinquish sove-" reign power when he was dragged by the feet, not "while he fat on horseback. It was easy," she said, at any moment, to relign the possession of a high sta-" tion; to arrive at, and acquire it, was difficult and " arduous." Defired him to "ask from the ambassadors a little time for confideration, and to employ it in fending for the foldiers from Leontini, to whom, " if he promised some of the royal treasure, he might " dispose of every thing at his pleasure." These counsels, suited to the character of the woman, Andranodorus neither totally rejected nor immediately adopted; judging it the fafer way to the acquisition of power, to yield to the times for the present. therefore defired the deputies to carry back for anfwer, that " he would be obedient to the directions " of the senate and people." Next day, at the first light, 10 light, he opened the gates of the island, and went BOOK into the Forum in the Achradina. There he afcended the altar of Concord, from whence Polyænus Y.R. 538. had addressed the people the day before, and first, B.C.214. at the beginning of his discourse, spent some time in intreating their pardon for the delay which he had made, for "he had kept the gates shut," he faid, " not with intention to separate his own in-" terest from that of the public, but through fearful " uncertainty, the fword being once drawn, when, " and in what way an end might be put to the shed-"ding of blood; whether they would be content " with the death of the tyrant, which was all that " the cause of liberty required, or whether all who " had any connection with the court, either by con-" fanguinity, affinity, or employments of any kind, " were to be put to death, as accomplices in another's " guilt. As foon as he perceived that those who had " freed their country, meant also, together with " liberty, to grant it fafety, and that the defigns of " all aimed at the promotion of the public happiness, " he had not hefitated to replace, under the direction " of the people, both his own person, and every thing " else committed to his charge and guardianship, " fince the prince who had intrusted him therewith " had perished through his own madness." Then, turning to those who had killed the tyrant, and addrefling Theodotus and Sosis by name, "you have " performed," faid he " a memorable exploit: but "believe me, the career of your glory is only be-" gun, not finished; and there yet subsists the ut" most danger, that unless you exert yourselves im-" mediately to fecure peace and harmony, the nation " may carry liberty to licentiousness."

XXIII. After this discourse, he laid the keys of the gates and of the royal treasure at their seet. Being dismissed, full of joy, the people, with their wives and children, spent that day in offering thanks.

BOOK thanksgivings in all the temples of the gods, and XXIV. on the day following an affembly was held for Y.R. 538. the election of prætors. Among the first was B.C. 214. chosen Andranodorus; the greater number of the rest were elected from the band of conspirators against the king. Two of these were absent at the time, Sopater and Dinomenes; who, on hearing what had passed at Syracuse, conveyed thither the money belonging to the king, which was at Leontini, and delivered it to quæstors appointed for the purpose: to whom was also delivered the treasure which was in the island and in the Achradina. That part of the wall, which formed too strong a fence between the island and the city, was, with universal approbation, abolished. The otherevents which took place corresponded with the general zeal for liberty, which now actuated men's minds: Hippocrates and Epicydes, when intelligence was received of the tyrant's death, which the former had wished to conceal even by the murder of the messenger, were deserted by the soldiers; and, as the fafest step in their present circumstances, returned to Syracuse. Lest their stay there should subject them to suspicion, as if they were watching some opportunity for effecting a revolution, they addressed first the practors, and afterwards, through them, the senate; represented, that, " being fent by Hannibal to Hieronymus, as to a " friend and ally, they had obeyed his orders, in " conformity to the will of their own commander. "That they wished to return to Hannibal, but as "they could not travel with tafety while every " part of Sicily was overspread with the Roman " arms, they requested that a guard might be " granted to escort them to Locri in Italy, and that "thus, with very little trouble, the fenate would " confer a great obligation on Hannibal." The request was easily obtained, for the senate wished the departure of those generals of the late king, men well well skilled in war, and at the same time needy and BOOK daring. But this measure, so agreeable to their wishes, they did not execute with the care and y.R.538. expedition requisite. Meanwhile those young men, B.C.214. accustomed to a military life, employed themselves fometimes among the foldiery; at others, among the deferters, the greatest number of whom were Roman feamen; at others, among the very lowest class of plebeians, in propagating infinuations against the fenate and nobility; hinting to them, that " in " the appearance of reviving the former alliance, 66 they were fecretly forming and preparing to-" execute a scheme of bringing Syracuse under 46 the dominion of the Romans; and that then 46 their faction, and the few advocates for the 46 renewal of the treaty, would domineer without " controul."

XXIV. Crowds of people, disposed to listen to and believe fuch reports, flocked into Syracuse in great numbers every day, and afforded, not only to Epicydes, but to Andranodorus likewise, some hopes of effecting a revolution. The latter, wearied by the importunities of his wife, who urged that, 46 now was the time to possess himself of the sove-" reignty, while all was in a state of disorder, in " consequence of liberty being lately recovered, but " not yet established on a regular footing; while "the foldiers, who owed their livelihood to the " pay received from the late King, were yet at " hand, and while the commanders fent by Han-66 nibal, who were well acquainted with those " foldiers, could aid the enterprise," took, as an affociate in his defign, Themistus, to whom Gelon's daughter was married; and, in a few days after, incautiously disclosed the affair to one Ariston, an actor on the stage, whom he was accustomed to entrust with other secrets; a man whose birth and circum-

BOOK circumstances were both reputable; nor did his Y.R. Greeks, that profession is not considered as dishonour-B.C.214. able. This man, resolving to be guided by the duty which he owed to his country, discovered the matter to the prætors; who, having learned by unqueftionable proofs that the information was well founded, first consulted the elder senators, by whose advice he placed a guard at the door of the fenatehouse, and, as soon as Themistus and Andranodorus entered, put them to death. This fact, in appearance uncommonly atrocious, the cause of which was unknown to the rest, occasioned a violent uproar; but, having at length procured filence, they brought the informer into the senate-house. He then gave a regular detail of every circumstance, shewing that the conspiracy owed its origin to the marriage of Gelon's daughter, Harmonia, with Themistus; that the auxiliary troops of Africans and Spaniards had been engaged for the purpose of massacring the prætors and others of the nobility, whose property, according to orders given, was to be the booty of their murderers; that a band of mercenaries, accultomed to the command of Andranodorus, had been procured, with the design of seizing again on the Island. He afterwards laid before them every particular; what things were to be done, and by whom, together with the whole plan of the conspiracy, supported by men with arms, ready to execute it. On which the fenate gave judgment, that they had suffered death as justly as Hieronymus. The crowd round the fenate-house being variously disposed, and unacquainted with the real state of the case, became clamorous: but, while they were uttering furious threats, the fight of the conspirators' bodies in the porch of the senate-house impressed them with fuch terror, that they filently followed the well-judging part of the plebeians to an affembly which was fummoned. Sopater was commissioned BOOK by the fenate and his colleagues to explain the mat- XXIV. ter to the people.

Y.R.538. B.C. 214.

XXV. He brought his charges against the deceased as if they were then on trial: after taking a review of their former lives, he infifted that whatever wicked and impious acts had been perpetrated fince the death of Hiero, Andranodorous and Themistus were the authors of them. "For what," faid he, "did the boy Hieronymus ever do by the "direction of his own will? What, indeed, could " he do who had fcarcely exceeded the years of " childhood? His guardians and teachers exercised ff the fovereign power, screened from the public hatred which fell on him; and therefore ought to " have died either before Hieronymus or with him. "Nevertheless, those men who had merited and 66 been doomed to die, have, fince the death of the tyrant, attempted new crimes; at first openly, "when Andranodorous, shutting the gates of the "Island, assumed the throne as his by inheritance, and kept as proprietor what he had held as trustee: " afterwards, being abandoned by those who were in " the Island, and blockaded by all the rest of the " citizens who held the Achradina, and finding his open and avowed attempts on the crown ineffectual, 66 he endeavoured to attain it by fecret machinations 46 and treachery: nor could he be induced to alter " his measures even by kindness and the honour " conferred on him ; for it should be remembered that among the deliverers of their country, this trea-" cherous conspirator against its liberty was chosen "a prætor. But the spirit of royalty has been in-"fuled into these men by their royal consorts, Hiero's "daughter married to one, Gelon's to the other." At these words a shout was heard from every part of the affembly, that "none of the race of the tyrants " ought to live." Such is the nature of the populace;

Y.R.538. B.C. 214.

BOOK they are either abject flaves or tyrannic masters. Liberty, which confifts in a mean between these, they either undervalue, or know not how to enjoy with moderation; and in general, there are not wanting agents disposed to foment their passions, who, working on minds which delight in cruelty, and know no restraint in the practice of it, exasperate them to acts of blood and flaughter. Thus, on the prefent occafion, the prætors instantly proposed the passing of an order, and it was hardly proposed before it was passed, that all the royal family should be put to death: whereupon persons sent by these magistrates, executed the fentence on Demarata, daughter of Hiero, and Harmonia, Daughter of Gelon, the wives of Andranodorus and Themistus.

> XXVI. There was another daughter of Hiero, called Heraclea, wife to Zoippus; who having been fent by Hieronymus ambassador to King Ptolemy, had continued abroad in voluntary exile. On getting notice that the executioners were coming to her also, she fled for refuge into the chapel of her household gods, taking with her two maiden daughters, with their hair dishevelled, and their appearance in every other particular calculated to excite compasfion: to this she added prayers, befeeching the executioners, "by the memory of her father Hiero, 46 and of her brother Gelon, not to suffer her, an "innocent woman, to be involved in ruin under " the hatred incurred by Hieronymus. To her " nothing had accrued, from his being on the " throne, but the exile of her hulband; neither, "during the life of Hieronymus, was her fituation " the same with that of her fister, nor fince his " death was her cause the same. Must it not " be allowed, that if Andranodorus had succeeded "in his projects, her fifter would have reigned " with him, whereas the must have been in fer-" vitude

" vitude with the rest? If any one should tell BOOK "Zoippus, that Hieronymus was killed and Syra. XXIV. " cuse free, who could doubt but he would in-Y.R. 538. stantly get on board a ship and return to his B.C. 214. country? How deceitful were the hopes of "men! Could he imagine, that in his native foil, restored to liberty, his wife and children were " struggling to preserve their lives; and in what " respect did they obstruct the cause of liberty " or the laws? What danger could arise from "them, a folitary, and, in a manner, widowed "woman, and her poor orphan children? " though no danger was apprehended from them, yet " the whole royal race was detested. Let herself and " children be banished far from Syracuse and from "Sicily; let them be conveyed to Alexandria; " a wife to her husband, the daughters to their " father." Finding them still inexorable, and wishing to make the belt use of the time, (for she saw some even drawing their swords,) she desisted from farther intreaties for herself, and continued to befeech them to "fpare, at least, her daughters, who "were children of an age which even enraged " enemies refrain from injuring; and not, while "they purfued their revenge against tyrants, to " imitate themselves the crimes which had raised "their hatred." While she was speaking, they dragged her from the fanctuary, and flew her; and then turned their weapons against the children, who were sprinkled with the blood of their mother. But they, deprived of reason by grief and fear together, rushed out of the chapel with such quickness, that, had a passage been open to the public street, they would have filled the whole city with tumult: even as it was, though the extent the house was not great, they several times made their way through the midst of many armed men, without receiving a wound, and extricated themselves from those that took hold of them, notwith-

BOOK standing the number and strength of the hands XXIV. with which they had to struggle; but at length, be-Y.R.538. ing reduced to the last weakness by wounds, after B.C. 214. covering every place with their blood, they fell and expired. This scene, piteous in itself, was rendered yet more fo by an incident that enfued; for shortly after, arrived a message, countermanding their execution, the fentiments of the people having fuddenly turned to the fide of compassion: and this compassion was soon converted into anger, on account of the precipitancy with which the fentence had been hurried on, so as to leave no time for re-confideration or the subfiding of passion. populace, therefore, expressed much discontent, and infifted on an affembly of election to fill up the places of Andranodorus and Themistus, for both had been prætors; and this election was not at all likely to terminate in a manner agreeable to the prefent prætors.

> XXVII. A day was appointed for the election, when, to the furprise of all, some person in the remotest part of the crowd named Epicydes; then another, in the fame quarter, Hippocrates; which names were afterwards the most frequently repeated, with the manifest approbation of the multitude. The affembly itself was an irregular one; for, not the commons alone, but also great numbers of the foldiery, and even of deferters, who wished to overturn every present establishment, composed the disorderly crowd. The magistrates, at first, pretended ignorance of what was going forward, thinking to protract the business; but, at last, overcome by the united voice of fo very many, and dreading an infurrection, they declared those men prætors: who, however, did not immediately unveil their fentiments, though greatly chagrined, - first, at ambassadors having gone to Appius Claudius to conclude a truce of ten days, and then, when that was obtained, BOOK on others being fent to negociate a renewal of the XXIV. old alliance. At this time the Romans had a fleet Y.R.538. of an hundred fail at Murgantia, watching what B.C.214. might be the result of the commotions of Syracuse, in consequence of the deaths of the tyrants, and to what points the view of the people might be directed by the late acquisition of liberty, to which they had fo long been strangers. Meanwhile, the Syracusan ambassadors had been sent by Appius to Marcellus on his arriving in Sicily; who, when he heard the terms on which they proposed the alliance, conceiving expectations that the business might be adjusted to mutual satisfaction, sent ambassadors on his part to Syracuse, to treat with the prætors in person. Here was no longer the same quiet and tranquillity: on news being received that a Carthaginian fleet had arrived at Pachynum, Hippocrates and Epicydes, freed from apprehension, now began, fometimes among the mercenary foldiers, at others among the deferters, to spread infinuations, that there was a defign of betraying Syracuse to the Romans. And when Appius came and kept his fleet stationed at the mouth of the harbour. with intention to raife the spirits of the other party, this gave the utmost appearance of credibility to their ill-grounded fuggestions, insomuch that the populace at the first ran down in a tumultuous manner, to oppose the landing of his men, if such an attempt should be made.

XXVIII. In this troubled state of affairs it was judged necessary to call a general assembly. Here, while opposite parties drew contrary ways, and a civil war was on the point of breaking out, one of the leading nobles, named Apollonides, addressed them in a discourse of very salutary tendency at such a juncture; telling them that "no state ever had a

BOOK

" nearer prospect either of safety or of ruin. K " all would unanimously incline either on the fide " of the Romans, or to that of the Carthaginians, Y.R.538. " their prosperity and happiness would equal that B.C.214. " of any other nation whatever. If separate parties 66 laboured to counteract each other, the war be-" tween the Carthaginians and the Romans was " not more furious, than would be that which " must follow between the Syracusans themselves, "when each party should have its own troops, its " own arms, its own leaders within the fame walls. 46 The most effectual endeavours ought to be used " to bring all to unanimity in opinion. Which of the alliances might be the more profitable, was " a question of a very inferior nature, and of much 46 less moment. Nevertheless, on the choice of " allies, they ought rather to follow the judgment " of Hiero than that of Hieronymus, and give "the preference to a friendship, of which they " had an happy experience for fifty years, before one which would be at the present new to them, and was formerly found deceitful. Ano-66 ther confideration ought to be allowed fome es weight in their resolves; that it was in their 66 power to decline a treaty of friendship with the "Carthaginians, and yet not to enter, immediately 46 at least, into a war with them; whereas with the Romans, they must instantly have either peace " or war." The less of party spirit and warmth this speech contained, the greater was its influence on the hearers. To the prætors, and a felect number of fenators, a military council was joined, and even the commanders of companies, and the præfects of the allies, were ordered to share in their consultations. After the affair had been frequently debated with great heat, they at last resolved, because they could discover no plan on which war could be maintained against the Romans, that a treaty of peace

peace should be formed with them, and that am-BOOK baffadors should be sent with those of that nation, then in Syracule, to ratify it.

Y.R. 538. B.C. 214.

XXIX. Not many days had paffed, when deputies from the Leontines arrived, requesting aid for the defence of their country; and this application was confidered as coming most feafonably for ridding the city of a disorderly turbulent rabble, and removing their leaders out of the way. The prætor, Hippocrates, was ordered to conduct the deferters thither; and these were accompanied by great numbers of mercenary auxiliaries, fo that the whole amounted to four thousand soldiers. This expedition was highly pleafing, both to the perfons employed, and to their employers; the former gaining, what they had long wished for, an opportunity for disturbing the government; the latter rejoicing at fuch a nuisance being removed; the fink, as it were, of the city. However this proved only like giving a fick person present ease, that he might relapse with an aggravation of his diforder. For Hippocrates began at first, by secret excursions, to ravage the nearest parts of the Roman province; but afterwards, when Appius had fent a body of troops to protect the territories of the allies, he attacked, with his entire force, a detachment posted in his way, and killed a great number. When Marcellus was informed of these transactions, he instantly dispatched ambassadors to Syracuse, to complain of this infraction of the treaty, and to represent, that occasions of quarrel would never be wanting, unless Hippocrates and Epicydes were banished, not only from Syracuse, but far from every part of Sicily. cydes not choosing, by remaining where he was, either to face the charge of being a confederate in his absent brother's crime, or to omit contributing his share towards effecting a rupture, went off to his feceding

BOOK feceding countrymen at Leonti, where, finding the XXIV. inhabitants filled with a fufficient degree of animofity against the Roman people, he undertook to detach B.C. 214. them from the Syracufans also. For "the latter," " he faid, " had stipulated in their treaty with " Rome, that every state which had been subject to "their kings, should for the future be subject to "them; and they were not now content with liberty, " unless they possessed along with it regal and ar-" bitrary power over other nations. The proper " answer, therefore, to be given to any requisition " from them, was, that the Leontines deemed them-" felves entitled to freedom no less than themselves, " if it were only because their city was the spot " where the tyrant fell; that there liberty was first " proclaimed, where the troops had abandoned the "King's generals, and flocked to Syracuse. Where-" fore that article must be expunged from the treaty, " or a treaty containing fuch an article should not " be admitted." The multitude were eafily perfuaded; and when ambaffadors from Syracuse complained of their cutting off the Roman detachment, and delivered an order, that Hippocrates and Epicydes should depart either to Locri, or to any other place which they chose, provided they retired out of Sicily, the Leontines roughly answered, that "they had not commissioned the Syracusans to " make a treaty of peace with the Romans for "them, neither were they bound by other people's "treaties." This answer the Syracusans laid before the Romans, declaring that "the Leontines " were not under their direction; that, therefore, " the Romans might make war on that people with-" out any violation of the treaty with Syracuse, and " that they would not fail to give their affiftance " in it, on condition that the others, when reduced " to fubmission, should be again subjected to their government."

XXX. Marcellus marched against Leontini with BOOK his whole force, fending also for Appius, that he XXIV. might attack it on another quarter; and so great was Y.R. 538. the ardour of the foldiers on that occasion, inspired B.C.214. by their refentment for the detachment being cut off while a treaty of peace was depending, that, at the first affault, they cand the town. Hippocrates and Epicydes, when they faw the enemy in possession of the walls, and breaking open the gates, retired, with a few others, into the citadel, from whence they made their escape secretly, during the night, to Herbeffus. The Syracufans having marched from home in a body, eight thousand in number, were met at - the river Myla by a meffenger, who acquainted them, that Leontini was taken, and who mixed feveral falsehoods with the truth, saying, that both falcers and townsmen had been put to the sword without distinction; nor did he believe that any one, above the age of childhood, was left alive; that the city was facked, and the effects of the wealthy bestowed on On hearing fuch a shocking account, the foldiers. the army halted; and, every one being highly exasperated, the commanders, who were Sosis and Dinomenes, entered into confultation how they The falle report had received a colour of truth sufficient to justify apprehension, from the circumstance of a number of deserters, amounting to two thousand, having been beaten with rods and beheaded. But not one of the Leontines, or the other foldiers, had been hurt after the capture of the city was completed; and every kind of property had been restored to the owners, except what was destroyed in the first confusion of the assault. troops, who complained grievously of their fellowfoldiers being treacherously put to death, could not be prevailed on, either to proceed to Leontini, or to wait in their present post for more certain intelligence. On which the prætors, perceiving that they were inclined to mutiny, but that this terment would

BOOK not be of long duration if their ringleaders in this XXIV. foolish conduct were removed, led the army to Megara, whence they themselves, with a small Y.R.538. body of horse, proceeded to Herbessus, with hopes that, in consequence of the general consternation, the city might be furrendered into their hands; but, being disappointed in their expectations, they next day decamped from Megara, in order to lay fiege to it with the whole of their force. Hippocrates and Epicydes now adopted a plan, which, though at first fight not fice from danger, yet, every hope being cut off, was the only one which they could puriue; this was to put themselves into the hands of the foldicry, of whom a great part were well acquainted with them, and all were incensed on account of the supposed slaughter of their fellowfoldiers; and they accordingly went out to meet the army on its approach. It happened that the corps which led the van was a battalion of fix hundred Cretans, who, in the reign of Hieronymus, had ferved under their command, and were also under an obligation to Hannibal, having been taken prisoners at the Trasimenus, with other auxiliaries to the Romans, and dismissed. Hippocrates and Epycides knowing them by their standards, and the fashion of their armour, advanced to them, holding out olive branches and other emblems of suppliants, and befought them to receive them into their ranks, to protect them there, and not to betray them into the hands of the Syraculans, by whom they themselves would foon be delivered up to the Romans, to be murdered. The Cretans immediately, with one voice, bade them keep up their courage, for they should share every fortune with them.

> XXXI. During this conversation the standards had halted, nor had the cause of the delay yet reached the general. But foon a rumour spread, that it was occasioned by Hippocrates and Epicydes, and a BOOK murmur ran along the whole line, evidently demon- XXIV. strating that the troops were pleased at their coming. Y.R. 538. On this, the prætors instantly rode forward, at full B.C. 214 fpeed, to the van, asking, "What fort of behaviour was this? What did the Cretans mean by such disorderly conduct, maintaining conversation with " an enemy, and allowing them to mix in their " ranks?" They then ordered Hippocrates to be feized, and put in chains. On which words fuch a clamour enfued, begun by the Cretans, and continued by the rest, as clearly shewed that if they proceeded farther in the matter, they would have cause to be apprehensive for their own fasety. Alarmed and perplexed by their fituation, they ordered the army to march back to Megara, and fent expresses to Syracuse, with accounts of their present state. While the men were disposed to entertain every kind of fuspicion, Hippocrates, to increase their apprehensions, employed an artifice: having fent out some of the Cretans to watch the roads, he afterwards read publicly a letter composed by himself, but which he pretended had been intercepted. The address was, "The prætors of Syra-" cufe to the conful Marcellus." After the usual falutations, it mentioned, that "he had acted " rightly and properly in not sparing any in Leon-"tini. That all the mercenary foldiers were to be " confidered in the fame light, and never would "Syracuse enjoy tranquillity as long as one of the " foreign auxiliaries remained, either in the city, or " in their army:" they therefore requested him to " use his endeavours to reduce under his power "those who were encamped with their prætors at "Megara, and, by putting them to death, effectuate, " at length, the delivery of Syracuse." As soon as this was read to the foldiers, they ran on all fides to arms with fuch clamours, that the prætors, in a fright,

Y.R 538 B.C. 214.

BOOK fright, rode away, during the confusion, to Syra-XXIV. cule. But even their flight did not ferve to quell the mutiny, and feveral attacks were made on the Syracufan troops: nor would one of them have found mercy, had not Epicydes and Hippocrates opposed the rage of the multitude, not through compassion or any humane intention, but through fear of torfeiting all hope of ever returning to the city; and from this further confideration, that, while they should find these men themselves both faithful foldiers and hostages, they would, at the same time, engage also the favour of their relations and friends; in the first place, by so great an obligation conferred. and then, by having such a pledge in their hands. As they knew, too, from experience, how flight and infignificant an impulse is sufficient to set the populace in motion, they procured a foldier, who had been one of the number belieged in Leontini, and fuborned him to carry to Syracuse, a story correfponding with the feigned tale told at Myla; and, by avowing himself the author, and afferting as facts, of which he had been an eye-witness, those particulars, of which doubts were harboured, to irritate the pallions of the people.

> XXXII. This man not only gained credit with the populace, but, being brought before the fenate, had address enough to influence even their judgment; and feveral, not apt to be over credulous, openly observed, that "it was happy that the 46 avarice and cruelty of the Romans had been " unmasked at Leontini. Had they come into Syra-" cuse, their behaviour would have been the same, " or probably more barbarous, as the incitements " to avarice were greater there." Wherefore all agreed in opinion, that the gates ought to be shut, and guards posted for the defence of the city. But they did not fo generally agree in the object either of their fears or their aversions. Among the mili-BOOK tary of all descriptions, and a great part of the ple- XXIV. beians, their hatred fell on the Roman nation; while Y.R.538. the prætors, and a few of the nobility, notwithstand- B.C. 214. ing that their judgment had been infected by the falle intelligence, yet took more pains to guard against a nearer and more immediate danger: for Hippocrates and Epicydes were already at the Hexapylum; and the relations of the native foldiers then in the army, were using many arguments to perfuade the people to open the gates, and to let their common country be defended against the Romans. And now one of the gates of the Hexapylum had been opened, and the troops had begun to march in, when the prætors arrived at the fpot; they endeavoured, at first by commands and menaces, then by counsel and advice, to deter the inhabitants from their purpose; and, at last, finding all these ineffectual, they descended from their dignity, and had recourse to entreaties, befeeching them not to betray their country to men who were lately instruments of a tyrant, and who now imprisoned the foldiers. minds. But, in the heat of the present ferment, the ears of the multitude were deaf to all fuch arguments, and efforts were made to break open the gates on the infide, no less violent than those from without. They were all foon forced, and the whole army received into the Hexapylum. The prætors, with the youth of the city, fled for fafety into the Achradina. The mercenaries, deferters, and all the foldiers of the late King, then in Syracuse, augmented the force of the enemy. In consequence, the Achradina was taken at the first assault, and the prætors, except fuch as could make their escape in the confusion, were all put to death. Night put an end to the shedding of blood. Next day the slaves were invited to freedom; all the prisoners were discharged from confinement, and the motly rabble, composed of all these different sorts, elected Hippocrates and

Epicydes

Y.R.538. B.C. 214.

BOOK Epicydes prætors: thus Syracuse, after a short en-XXIV. joyment of the funshine of liberty, funk back into its former state of servitude.

> XXXIII. As foon as the Romans were informed of these events, they immediately decamped from Leontini, and marched to Syracuse. At the same time it happened that ambassadors, sent by Appius, and who were approaching the place in a quinquereme, with difficulty escaped being taken: which, however, was the fate of a quadrireme, ordered to advance some distance before their galley, on its entering the harbour. And now not only the laws of peace, but even those of war, had been all thrown aside, when the Roman army pitched their camp at Olympium, a temple of Jupiter so called, distant a mile and a half from the city. From hence also it was judged proper to fend ambaffadors, who were prevented entering the city by Hippocrates and Epicydes, with their adherents, coming out from the gate to meet them. The Roman, whose part it was to speak, faid, that "the Romans came " not with the intention of making war on the "Syraculans, but of giving fuccour and support " both to fuch as, after extricating themselves "from the midst of carnage, sled to them for " refuge; and also to those, who, overpowered " by fear, endured a bondage more shocking, not "only than exile, but even than death." "would the Romans fuffer fuch an abominable maf-" facre of their allies to pass unpunished. "fore if those, who had taken refuge with them, " were allowed to return to their country with fafety, " and the authors of the maffacre were delivered " up, and liberty and their laws restored to the Sy-" raculans, there would be no occasion for quarrel. 3 If these requisitions were not complied with, who-" ever was the cause of the refusal should undergo "the feverest vengeance which their arms could be in the hands of those to whom they came, "they might then return to Sicily. If they began " hostilities, they should learn, on trial, that the " fiege of Syracuse was a very different kind of " business from that of Leontini." So faying, he turned his back on the ambassadors, and shut the gates. The Romans then, immediately, began to form the fiege of Syracuse, both by land and sea; by land, on the fide of the Hexapylum; by fea, on that of the Achradina, the wall of which is washed by its waves. Having mastered Leontini by the terror which their affault inspired, and that at the first attack, they doubted not but they should be able, in some quarter or other, to make their way into a city of fuch wide extent, and whose defended parts lay at fuch a distance from each other; they pushed forward therefore to the walls every kind of machine used in sieges.

" inflict." To this Epicydes replied, that "if they BOOK "had been charged with any message to him, and XXIV.

"his friends, they would have returned an answer.

"That when the government of Syracuse should B.C. 214.

XXXIV. This enterprize, from the spirit and vigour with which it was undertaken, must have met the expected fuccess, had it not been for one fingle person then in Syracuse: this was Archimedes, a man fingularly skilled in the science of astronomy, and a great geometrician, eminently diffinguished in the invention and construction of warlike engines, by means of which, with very flight exertions, he baffled the efforts of the enemy, n ade with immense labour. The wall, which, being drawn along unequal eminences, was in some parts high and difficult of access, in others low and liable to be approached through the level vales, he furnished with machines of all kinds, adapted to the nature of each particular place. That of the Achradina, which, as before observed.

Y.R.538.

BOOK observed, is washed by the sea, Marcellus attacked from his largest ships; while from the small vessels the archers, flingers, and light-infantry, (whose wea-B.C. 214. pon is of fuch a kind that it cannot well be thrown back, except by experienced hands,) wounded almost every one defending the works. These requiring room for the discharge of their missiles, kept at a distance: but the other and larger ships, eight in number, were fastened together in pairs, by the removal of one tier of oars; while those on the exterior fides moved them both as if a fingle ship. These carried turrets of several stories in height, with instruments for demolishing the rampart. Against this naval armament, Archimedes disposed, on the walls, engines of various sizes. the ships, which lay at a distance, he discharged rocks of immense weight; and those which lay nearer, lighter and therefore more numerous annoyances. And lastly, he opened in the wall from top to bottom a great number of spike-holes, a cubit in diameter, through which, without being feen, or in danger of being hurt, they poured arrows and darts from fcorpions. Some ships having come up closer, in order that the weapons from the engines might fly over them, he used an engine called Tolleno, composed of a long lever supported at the middle, and fixed in fuch a manner that one arm of it projected beyond the wall; from the extremity of this hung, by a strong chain, an iron grapple, which, taking hold of the fore part of the ship, while the other extremity of the lever was weighed down to the ground by a heavy counterpoise of lead, lifted up the prow and set the vessel on its ftern; the grapple then was fuddenly difengaged, and the ship was, to the utter consternation of the feamen, dashed into the water with such force, that even if it had fallen in an erect position, it would have taken in a great deal of water.

By-these means the affailants were foiled in every BOOK attempt by fea; abandoning therefore that part of XXIV. the plan, they bent all their efforts to the pushing Y.R.538. forward the operations by land, and with their whole B.C. 214. But on this fide, too, the place was furnished with a fimilar train of engines of every description, procured in a course of many years by the direction and at the expence of Hiero, and through the fingular skill of Archimedes. The nature of the ground also was favourable to the defendants, because the rock on which the foundations of the wall were laid, is in most places so steep, that not only bodies thrown from an engine, but fuch as rolled down by their own weight, fell with great power on the enemy: the same cause rendered the ascent difficult to be climbed, and the footing unisteady. Wherefore a council being held, it was refolved, fince every attempt ended in disappointment and diffrace, to defift from farther attacks, and only to blockade the place fo closely as to cut off all fupplies of provisions, either by land or fea.

XXXV. Meanwhile Marcellus marched, with about a third part of the forces, to recover those cities which, during the general disturbances, had revolted to the Carthaginians. Helorus and Herbessus he received by voluntary surrender. Having taken Megara by storm, he sacked and demolished it, in order to strike terror into others, particularly the Syracusans. About the same time Himilco, who had for a long time kept his sleet at the promontory of Pachynum, landed at Heraclea, which is also called Minoa, twenty-sive thousand infantry, three thousand horses, and twelve elephants; a much greater force than he had before on board his ships at Pachynum. When Syracuse was seized by Hippocrates, he had gone to Carthage, and there, being

BOOK being encouraged by ambassadors from him as chief, Y.R.538. the time was now come for recovering possession of B.C. 214. Sicily with the highest honour; and as his own advice given on the fpot had no fmall degree of influence, he eafily procured an order, that the greatest force possible of infantry and cavalry should be transported into that island. Immediately on his arrival he reduced Heraclea, and within a few days after, Agrigentum; raifing at the same time in all the other states, who sided with the Carthaginians, fuch warm hopes of expelling the Romans from Sicily, that at last even the Syracusans, besieged as they were, assumed new courage. Judging that a part of their forces would be fufficient for defence alone, they divided the business in such a manner, that Epicydes should command the troops fo appointed for guarding the city, and Hippocrates, in conjunction with Himilco, conduct the war against the Roman conful. The latter accordingly, with ten thousand foot and five hundred horse, having passed by night through some intervals between the Roman posts, began to pitch his camp near the city Acrillæ: while they were raifing their fortifications, Marcellus came upon them, for he was now returning from Agrigentum, to which place he had in vain haftened by quick marches, in hope of reaching it before the enemy, but he found it already in their poffession, and expected nothing less at that time than to meet a Syracusan army in his way. However, through fear of Himilco and the Carthaginians, for whom he was by no means a match with the force which he then had, he was marching with all possible caution, and with his troops prepared for every occurrence.

> XXXVI. This precaution adopted against the Carthaginians, happened to prove uleful in respect of the Syraculans.

Finding them scattered, separately BOOK Syraculans. employed in forming their camp, and mostly XXIV. unarmed, he furrounded and cut off the whole of YR.538. their infantry; the cavalry, after a flight opposition, B.C. 214. fled with Hippocrates to Acrae. This stroke having effectually checked the defigns of those states, which were disposed to revolt from the Romans, Marcellus returned to Syracuse; and, after a few days, Himilco, being joined by Hippocrates, came and encamped at the river Anapus, about eight miles distant. About the same time sifty-five Carthaginian ships of battle, commanded by Bomilcar, as admiral, put into the great harbour at Syracuse, and a Roman fleet of thirty quinquerenies landed the first legion at Panormus; it seemed, indeed, as if the theatre of war was removed hither from Italy, fo intent were both nations on the affairs of Sicily. Himilco expected that the Roman legion, landed at Panormus, would fall a prey to him on its way to Syracuse; but he missed it by taking the road which led through the inland parts of the country, while the legion, keeping close to the sca-coast, and being attended by the fleet, effected a junction with Appius Claudius, who, with a part of his forces, came as far as Pachynum to meet it. Nor did the Carthaginians delay longer at Syracufe. On the one hand, Bomilcar was diffident of his own ftrength at fea, as the Romans had a fleet, of at least double his number; and, at the same time, as he perceived that the only effect of his forces remaining there, where they could do no fervice, vould be, the aggravating the diffress of his allies in the article of provisions, he failed out into the main, and passed over to Africa. On the other hand, Himilco had in vain followed Marcellus to Syracuse, in hopes of finding an opportunity of engaging him before he should join the larger division of his army; but being disappointed in this, and seeing likewise that BOOK the enemy's post at Syracuse was secured from XXIV. every attempt, both by the fortifications and the Y.R 538. number of their forces, he did not choose to waste B.C.214. time to no purpose in sitting there as a spectator of the fiege carried on against his allies, and therefore decamped and marched away his army, with intention to carry it wherever a prospect of a revolt from the Romans should invite him, that he might invigorate by his presence the resolution of those who favoured his interest. And first, through the treachery of the inhabitants, who betrayed the Roman garrison, he got possession of Murgantia, where the Romans had large magazines of corn and every kind of provisions.

> XXXVII. By this revolt, other states were encouraged to imitate the example; and the Roman garrisons were either driven out of the fortresses, or betrayed and overpowered. Enna, standing on a lofty eminence, which was steep and craggy on every fide, was not only impregnable by reason of its fituation, but had moreover a strong force in its citadel, with a governor who could not be eafily overreached by treachery. This was Lucius Pinarius, a man of spirit and activity, who relied more on his own precaution, to render every scheme of perfidy impracticable, than on the fidelity of the Sicilians; and his folicitude to be prepared for every emergency was now increased by the intelligence he had received of fo many cities revolting, or being betrayed, and the garrifons put to death. Wherefore, every thing was kept in a state of readiness, with guards and watches constantly on duty, as well by night as by day, nor did the foldier ever quit his arms or his post. When the leading men in Enna, who had already bargained with Himilco for the betraying of the garrison, understood that the Roman commander had left no room for the practice of any deception, they re- BOOK folved to act openly, and represented to him, that XXIV. the city and the citadel ought to be under their care, Y.R. 538. fince they had been connected with "the Ro- B.C. 214. " mans as free men in alliance, not as flaves in "custody." They therefore required that the keys of the gates should be returned to them, obferving, that " on good allies honour was the " strongest tie, and that then only would the senate "and people of Rome think them deferving of "thanks, when they should continue in friendship " out of their own free will, not through compul-" fion." To this the Roman answered, that "he "was placed there by his general, and from "him had received the keys of the gates and "the cultody of the citadel, which he held not at "his own disposal, or that of the inhabitants of 66 Enna, but at his who had committed them to "his charge. That to relinquish a man's post in " a garrison, was, among the Romans, a capital " crime, and that parents had confirmed that " law even by the death of their own children. "That the conful Marcellus was not far distant; " let them fend ambaffadors to him, who had the " right and authority to determine." They declared positively, that they would not fend, and gave him notice, that, fince words were of no avail, they would feek fome other means of afferting their liberty. Pinarius then defired, " that if they did on the not choose to take the trouble of sending to the " conful, they would, at least, allow him to meet "the people in affembly, that it might be known "whether these were the denunciations of a party " only, or of the whole state:" which being agreed to, an affembly was proclaimed for the following day.

XXXVIII. After this conversation, he went back immediately into the citadel, and calling the troops

BOOK troops together, spoke thus: "Soldiers, you must

XXIV. " have heard in what manner the Roman garrisons " have, of late, been betrayed and cut off by the Y.R 538. "Sicilians. The same treachery you have escaped, " principally through the kindness of the gods, and " next through your own resolution, in keeping " continual guard and watch under arms, without " intermission by day or by night. I wish it were " in our power to pass the rest of our time without " either enduring or offering cruel treatment. But " this caution, which we have higherto used, guards " only against their secret machinations; which, not " having fucceeded to then wish, they now openly " and plainly demand the keys of the gates. The " moment these are delivered to them, Enna will be " made over to the Carthaginians, and we shall be " maffacred here in a more shocking manner than "were those of Murgantia. This one night's " time, I have, with difficulty, procured for con-" fultation, that I might applife you of the im-" minent danger to which you are exposed. " funrife they intend to hold an affembly for the " purpose of criminating me, and incensing the " populace against you: before to-morrow night, " therefore, Enna will be deluged either with your 66 blood, or with that of its inhabitants. " anticipate your measures, you will have no re" fource; if you anticipate theirs, you will have no "danger: whoever first draws the sword, his will 66 be the victory. Do you therefore, in arms, and with all your attention awake, wait for "the fignal. I will be in the affembly, and, by " talking and difputing, will prolong the time until " every thing shall be ready. As foon as I give the figual with my gown, then let me fee that " you raise a shout on every quarter, attack the " multitude, and mow down all with the fword; " take care that no one be left alive from whom " either force or fraud can be feared. O! Mother " Ceres

"Ceres and Proferpine, and you other gods whether BOOK KXIV.
"of the superior or inferior regions, who patronise this city and these consecrated lakes and groves, fo prosper us, I beseech you, with your favour and affistance, as we undertake such an enterprise with a view of averting, not of afflicting injury. I would use more words in exhorting you, soldiers, if you were to have a contest with men in arms: that unarmed and unguarded crowd you will kill until you shall be fatisfied with killing: besides, the consul's camp is at hand, so that nothing can be feared from Himilco and the Carthaginians."

XXXIX. Being difinified with this exhortation, they went to take refreshment. Next day they posted themselves in different places, to block up the streets, and shut the passes against the townsmen going out; the greatest part of them, on and rouna the theatre, as they had been before accustomed to stand spectators of the assemblies. The Roman commander was conducted by the magistrates into the presence of the people, where he represented, that the power and authority of determining the business in question lay in the consul, not in him, urging mostly the same arguments, which he had used the day before; on which a few at first, then greater numbers, at last all, with one voice, insisted on his delivering the keys; and when he hefitated and demurred, began to threaten him furiously, shewing evidently that they would no longer refrain from the utmost violence. The governor then gave the concerted fignal with his gown. The foldiers were prepared, having a long time expected it with earnest attention; and now, while some of them, with loud fhouts, ran down from the higher places against the rear of the assembly, others, in close array, blocked up the raffages from the theatre. Thus, pent up in the inclosure, the inhabitants of Enna were put to the fword. Yet did they perish,

not

Y.R.538

BOOK not only by the weapons of their enemy, but by XXIV. their own hasty flight, for many tumbled over the others, and the whole falling on the wounded, the B.C. 214. living on the dead were all promiscuously heaped together. From thence, the foldiers spread themfelves over the city, and, as if it had been taken by storm, filled every part of it with terror and carnage, their rage venting itself with no less fury on the unarmed crowd, than if their passions had been exasperated by an equality of danger in the heat of Thus, by an act, either wholly unjustifiable, or excufable only on the ground of necessity, the possession of Enna was retained. Marcellus shewed no disapprobation of the deed; on the contrary, he granted the plunder of that place to the foldiers; thinking that the Sicilians, deterred by fear of like treatment, would defift from the practice of betraying the Roman fortreffes. The history of the sad catastrophe of this city, which stood in the middle of Sicily, and was fo conspicuous, both on account of the extraordinary natural strength of its situation, as also on account of every part of it being rendered facred by the monuments of the rape of Proferpine of old, reached every part of the island almost in one day. People confidered that horrid carnage as a violation of the mansions of the gods, as well as of those of men; and now even those who had hesitated until this time, openly declared in favour of the Carthagi-Hippocrates then retired to Murgantia, and Himilco to Agrigentum; for they had, on an invitation from the treacherous inhabitants, brought their armies to Enna to no purpose. returned into the territory of Leontini, where, having flored his camp with magazines of corn and other provisions, and left a small body of troops to defend it, he went to carry on the fiege of Syracuse. pius Claudius having obtained his leave to go to Rome to canvals for the confulship, he appointed in his room Titus Quintus Crispinus to the command mand of the fleet and of the old camp. He fortified a camp for himself, in which he erected huts for the winter, at a place called Leon, five miles distant from the Hexapylum. These were the transactions in Sicily previous to the commencement of winter.

XL. During that fummer, the war with King Philip, which had been apprehended for some time, broke out into action. Deputies came from Oricum to the proprætor Marcus Valerius, who commanded the fleet at Brundusium and on the neighbouring coasts of Calabria, informing him, that Philip had first attempted Appolloma, sailing up the river with a hundred and twenty barks of two banks of oars; and, not fucceeding there as speedily as he expected, had afterwards marched his army fecretly by night to Oricum, which city, being fituated in a plain, and being but weakly defended, either by fortifications or by men and arms, was overpowered at the first assault. To this information they joined intreaties, that he would bring them fuccour, and repel the attacks of that avowed enemy to the Romans from the maritime cities, which were affailed for no other reason, than because they lay contiguous to Italy. Marcus Valerius, leaving a lieutenant-general, Titus Valerius, to maintain his present post, and putting on board the ships of burden a number of foldiers, for whom there was not room in the ships of war, set sail with his fleet fully equipped and prepared, and arrived on the fecond day at Oricum, and without much difficulty retook that city, which had for its defence but a weak garrison, left by Philip at his departure. Hither came deputies from the Appollonians, with information, that they were belieged, because they refused to take part against the Romans, and that they were unable longer to withfland the force of the Macedonians. Y.R.538.

BOOK donians, unless a Roman garrison were sent to their XXIV. aid. Valerius promifed to comply with their wishes, and fent two thousand chosen men in ships of war B.C.214. to the mouth of the river, under the command of Quintus Nævius Crista, præfect of the allies, a man of an enterprifing spirit and experienced in service. He, as foon as his men were landed, fent back the ships to join the rest of the fleet at Oricum, whence he came; and leading his troops at a distance from the river, through a road where he was least likely to meet any of the King's party, got into town by night, without being discovered by them. During the following day all remained quiet, while the præfect reviewed the forces of the Appollonians, their arms, and the defences of the city. On examining all those matters, he found sufficient ground for confidence; at the same time learning from scouts, that a great degree of negligence and inattention prevailed among the enemy. In confequence of this intelligence, he marched out of the city in the dead of the night, without any noise, and, on entering their camp, found it so neglected and exposed, that a thousand of his men had gotten within the rampart, as we are well affured, before any one perceived them, and had they refrained from killing the foldiers, might have reached the pavilion of the King. The destroying of those who were nearest to the gate roused the others from sleep: and immediately fuch terror and difmay took possession of all, that not one of them offered to take arms, or to attempt expelling the affailants: nay, inflead of that, even the King himself sled in the same condition as he had started out of bed; half naked in a manner, and in a dress which would scarcely be decent for a private foldier, much less a monarch, he effected his escape to his ships in the river. Thither also the rest of the multitude directed their precipitate flight. Somewhat less than three thou-fand men were either killed or taken, but the num- BOOK ber of prisoners considerably exceeded that of the XXIV. killed. The camp was then facked, and the Ap- Y.R. 538. pollonians carried into their city, for the defence of B.C. 214. their walls on any future occasion, the catapultas, balistas, and other engines, which had been provided for the purpose of demolishing them; all the rest of the booty found in the camp was configned to the Romans. As foon as the news of this event reached Oricum, Marcus Valerius instantly drew his fleet to the mouth of the river, left the King should attempt to escape by water. Philip, therefore, despairing of being able to cope with his adversaries, either by land or fea, drew up fome of his ships into dock, burned the rest, and with his troops, mostly unarmed and despoiled of their baggage, returned by land into Macedonia. Marcus Valerius, with the Roman fleet, wintered at Oricum.

XLI. In Spain the contending parties met with various fuccess during this campaign. For, before the Romans passed the river Iberus, Mago and Hasdrubal defeated a very numerous army of Spaniards, and all farther Spain would have revolted from the Romans, had not Publius Cornelius, by a rapid march, arrived in time to confirm the wavering refolutions of his allies. The Romans encamped, first at a place called the High Fort, remarkable for the death of the great Hamilcar. The fortress was strong, and they had already provided a store of corn. Nevertheless, because all the country round was full of the enemy's troops, and as the Roman army, on its march, had been haraffed by their cavalry, without being able to take revenge, and had loft two thousand men, who either loitered behind or straggled through the country, they removed thence to the neighbourhood of a friendly people, and fortified a camp at the mount of Victory. Hither came Cneius Scipio with all his forces; while Y.R.538. B.C. 214.

BOOK while on the other side, Hasdrubal, son of Gisgo, with a complete army, joined the other two Carthaginian generals, and their whole combined forces fat down opposite to the Roman with a river between them. Publius Scipio, going out privately with some light-armed troops to take a view of the adjacent country, passed not unobserved by the enemy, who would have cut him off in an open plain, had he not feized an eminence, which was nigh. Even there he was closely invested, but his brother coming up, relieved him from that dangerous fituation. Castulo, a strong city, reckoned among the most remarkable in Spain, and so closely connected with the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had married a native of it, revolted to the Romans. The Carthaginians laid fiege to Illiturgi, because it was held by a Roman garrison, and they had reason to expect that it would soon fall into their hands, chiefly in confequence of a scarcity of provisions. Cneius Scipio, with a legion lightly equipped, marched to the relief of the allies and the garrison, and forced his way into the city, between the two camps of the enemy with great flaughter of their men. On the day following he made a fally, and fought with the fame fuccefs. In the two battles, he killed above twelve thousand men, and took more than ten thousand, with thirtyfix military standards: in consequence of which losses, the Carthaginians raised the siege. They then fat down before the city of Bigerra, which also was in alliance with the Romans, but on the approach of Cneius Scipio raifed the fiege without a battle.

> XLII. The Carthaginians then removed their camp to Munda, whither the Romans quickly followed them. Here a general engagement took place, which lasted near four hours: the Romans had decidedly the advantage; but, while they were purfuing pursuing the victory with the utmost ardour, the BOOK fignal of retreat was given, in consequence of XXIV. Cneius Scipio's thigh being pierced through with Y.R 538. a javelin; the foldiers round him being feized B.C. 214. with a panic, in the supposition that the wound was mortal. There was no doubt, but that, if they had not been thus stopped, they would, on that day, have taken the enemy's camp. their foldiers, but elephants also, had already been driven up to the rampart, and, on the top of it, thirty-nine elephants had been killed with fpears. Twelve thousand men are said to have fallen in this battle, and near three thousand to have been taken, with fifty-feven military enfigns. thence the Carthaginians retreated to the city of Aurinæ, and the Romans, not to allow them time to recover from their defeat, followed them closely. Here Scipio, though carried into the field in a litter, engaged them again, and obtained a decided victory: though fewer of the enemy, by half, were flain in this battle than in the former; because, after their loss on that occasion, they could only bring a smaller number into the field. But as they are a race fitted by nature for the reviving of wars and the recruiting of armies, they foon, through the diligence of Mago, who was fent by his brother to levy foldiers, filled up their complement of their troops, and refumed courage to risk a-fresh the issue of a battle. Though their battalions were now composed mostly of foreign foldiers, yet fighting on a fide which had fuffered fo many discomfitures within a few days, they shewed the fame spirit as before, and the same consequence More than eight thousand men were flain. not many short of a thousand taken prisoners, together with fifty-eight military standards. The greater part of the spoils had belonged to the Gauls, among which were golden chains and bracelets in great numbers; there were also two remarkable chieftains of the Gauls killed in that battle, Mænicaptus

B.C. 214.

BOOK captus and Civismarus: eight elephants were taken, XXIV. and three killed. During this current of fuccess Y.R. 538. in Spain, the Romans began to feel ashamed of having fuffered the town of Saguntum, the original object of dispute, to continue five years in the possession of the enemy. Wherefore, diflodging the Carthaginian garrison, they retook possession of the town, and restored it to such of the inhabitants as had furvived the violence of the conflict. As to the Turdetanians, who had been the instigators of the war between the Carthaginians and the people, they totally subdued them, fold them as flaves, and rafed their city to the ground. Such were the occurrences in Spain during the consulate of Quintus Fabius and Marcus Claudius.

> XLIII. At Rome, no fooner had the new plebeian tribunes entered into office, than one of them, Lucius Metellus, fummoned the cenfors, Publius Furius and Marcus Ætilius, to trial before the people. In the preceding year, when he was quæstor, they had degraded him from the equestrian rank and from his tribe, and had disfranchifed him on account of his having formed a conspiracy at Cannæ to abandon Italy: but they were supported by the other nine tribunes, who protested against their being brought to trial, and were confequently difcharged. The death of Publius Furius prevented their closing the Lustrum; and Marcus Ætilius abdicated his office. The election of confuls was held by the conful Quintus Fabius Maximus, and two were chosen who were both absent at the time, Quintus Fabius Maximus, the present consul's fon, and Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, a fecond time. The prætors appointed were Marcus Atilius and two who were then curule ædiles, Publius Semponius Tuditamus and Cneius Fulvius Centumalus, and laftly, Marcus Æmilius Lepidus. recorded.

recorded that stage plays were now, for the first BOOK time, exhibited four days fuccessively, by direction XXIV. of the curule ædiles, This Tuditanus, now ædile, Y.R.538. was the person who, at Cannæ, while the rest were B.C. 214. stupified by fear, in consequence of such a dreadful difaster, made his way through the middle of the enemy.

XLIV. As foon as the elections were finished, Y.R. 539. the confuls elect were called home to Rome, by the B.C. 213. advice of the present consul Quintus Fabius, and assumed the administration. They then called a meeting of the fenate, to determine concerning their own provinces and those of the prætors, the armies to be employed, and the commanders to whom each was to be allotted. These were distributed in the following manner: To the confuls was affigned the province of making head against Hannibal; and of the armies, the one which Sempronius himself had already under his command, and another commanded by the late conful Fabius. These confisted of two legions each. Marcus Æmilius, the prætor, to whose lot the foreign jurisdiction had fallen, (his share in the administration of justice being configned to his colleague,) Marcus Atilius, city prætor, was to hold the province of Luceria, and the two legions which Quintus Fabius, the present consul, had commanded as prætor; to Publius Sempronius fell the province of Ariminium; to Cneius Fulvius, Sueffula, with two legions likewise to each; Fulvius to take with him the city legions; Tuditanus to receive his from Marcus Pomponius. lowing commanders and provinces were continued: to Marcus Claudius, Sicily, so far as the limits of Hiero's dominions had extended; to Lentulus, proprætor, the old Roman province in that island; to Titus Otacilius, the fleet. No additions were made to their armies. Greece and Macedonia were allotted to Marcus Valerius, with the legion and fleet

BOOK fleet which he had there; to Quintus Mucius, Sar" XXIV. dinia, with his old army, which confifted of two legions, and to Caius Terentius, Picenum, with the one B.C. 213. legion at the prefent under his command. It was ordered, that, besides those mentioned, two city is gions should be levied, and twenty thousand troops of the allies. These were the leaders, these the forces, provided for the defence of the Roman emple. against a multitude of enemies, either declared or fuspected. The confuls, after raising the two legions, and filling up the numbers of the others, before they quitted Rome, expiated several prodigina, which had been reported. A wall and a gate-lad been struck by lightning, and also the temple of Jupiter at Aricia. Besides which, several deceptions of the eyes and ears were credited as facts; that the figures of ships of war had appeared in the river at Tarracina, where no such ships were; that in the temple of Jupiter, at Vicilinum in the district of Compfa, a clashing of arms was heard, and that the river at Amiternum flowed in streams of blood. When the expiation of these was performed, according to the direction of the pontiffs, the confuls fet out, Sempronius to Lucania, Fabius to Apulia. The father of the latter coming into the camp at Suesfula, as lieutenant-general under his son, the son went out to meet him, and the lictors, out of reverence to his dignity, went on in filence, until the old man rode past eleven of the fasces, when the conful ordering his next lictor to take care, he called to him to dismount, and the father then, at length, alighting, said, "I had a mind, my son, to try whether you were properly fensible of being " conful."

XLV. Into this camp Darius Altinius of Arpi came privately by night, with three flaves, promifing that if he were properly rewarded, he would betray Arpi to them. Fabius held a council to con-

fider

fider of the matter, when some were of opinion, that BOOK " he ought to be scourged and put to death as a XXIV. "deferter, being a common foe to both parties, Y.R.539. wer ready to change fides; who, after the mif- B.C. 213. "Fortune at Cannee, as if faith ought to follow the changes of fortune, had gone over to the Carthaginians, and drawn Arpi into a revolt; and when the Roman affairs were, contrary to hopes and wishes, recovering from that dis-*alter, it must appear doubly base to offer to serve, sp an act of treachery, the party on whom he 44 had practifed his treachery before. Such a wretch, " who always appeared to act on one fide, while his " withes were on the other, fuch a perfidious ally " and fickle enemy, ought to be made a third leffon "to deferters along with the Falerian and Pyr-" rhus's traitors." On the other hand Fabius, the conful's father, faid, that "people did not attend "to the state of the times, but, in the very heat " of war, as in a time of tranquillity, pronounced " their decisions on every case without any allow-" ance for circumstances. Thus, at a time when " they should rather contrive and labour to prevent, " if possible, any of the allies revolting from the "Roman cause, or become wavering in their incli-66 nations, they were of opinion, that a person who " repented and shewed an inclination to return to "his former connections, ought to be punished for 46 an example. But it those who had once forsaken the part of the Romans, were at no time allowed to return to it, who could doubt, but that their 44 nation would be deferted by its allies, and that " they would shortly see every state in Italy combined " under Carthaginian treaties? Nevertheless he was " not disposed to think that any confidence should 66 be reposed in Altinius: but he would strike out a " middle way of proceeding, and recommend that, at present, he should not be treated either as an 44 enemy or an ally, but should, during the con-" tinuance

മ്മാ

BOOK "tinuance of the war, be kept in custody, XXIV. " fmall distance from the same, in some sity will " fidelity could be relied on; and that, of Y.R.539. " event of peace, it should be considered B.C. 213. "ther his former defection pleaded stronger " punishment, or his present return for par-This advice of Fabius was adopted. Althuit bound in chains, and, together with his attenda delivered into custody; and a large quantity of which he had brought with him, was ordered to kept for his use. He was sent to Cales, where the was allowed to go out by day attended by who confined and watched him by night. was missed at his house in Arpi, search was mare for him at first, then the report of what had happened spreading through the city, occasioned a timult among the citizens, as if they had loft their leader; fo that, dreading an alteration of their prefent freem, they dispatched, instantly, to Hannibal an account of the affair. This was not at all displeasing whe Carthaginian, because he had long harboured this picions of him, knowing the duplicity of him racter; and besides, he had now gained an state for feizing and confiscating his great property. ever, in order to make people believe that he was actuated rather by anger than rapaciousness, he. axhibited a scene of uncommon barbarity; for, having ordered his wife and children to be brought into the camp, he made a strict inquiry concerning the flight of Altinius, and likewife concerning the quantities of gold and filver which he had left at home; and, when he had got fufficient information of every particular. he barned them alive.

> XLVI. Fabius fet out from Sueffula, intending to open the campaign with the fiege of Arpi, and having pitched his camp about half a mile from the place, and taken a near view of the fituation and fortifications of the town, he refolved to make his

cipal ettack on a quarter where the works were BOOK

trongest, and the guard the most negligently XXIV. After providing every thing requifite for an Y.R. 539. sit. he litected out of the whole army the ableft B.C. 213. prions, and placed over them tribunes of known very, giving them fix hundred foldiers, which ber was deemed fufficient, with orders, that, on founding of the fignal of the fourth watch, they ald advance with scaling ladders to the chosen spot. eate on that fide was low and narrow, the corthe ding street being little frequented, as leading a deferted part of the town. He ordered after first fealing the wall, to proceed to this gate, and break down the bars on the infide; then, as foon as they had got possession of that quarter of the saw, to give the fignal with a cornet, that the real the forces might join them, faying, that he have every thing in readiness. His orders were executed with vigour and spirit; while a cirtaking, proved the most favourable for contheir operations. A heavy rain at midpobliged the guards and watches in the town to: dip away from their posts, and run for shelter into the houses, while the loudness of the storm. which was most violent at the beginning, prevented their hearing the noise made by those who were breaking the postern, and the sound, becoming afterwards more foft and regular, lulled most of the men to fleep. As foon as the affailants had fecured poffession of the gate, they placed the cornet-players in the street, at equal distances, and ordered them to found as a fummons to the conful; who, finding this part of the plan executed, immediately ordered his troops to march, and, a little before day, entered the city through the broken gate.

XLVII. At length the enemy were roused, the rain too abating with the approach of day. There

s 3

B.C. 213

BOOK was in the city a garrifon of Hannibal's troops, XXIV. amounting to five thousand effective men, and the armed people of Arpi themselves were three thousand more. These latter, the Carthaginians, to guard against any treachery on their rear, opposed in front to the enemy. The fight was maintained for some time in the dark, and in narrow streets, the Romans having seized not only all the passes, but the houses likewise next to the lest they might be struck or wounded by any thing thrown down from them. Some of the Applans and Romans recognifing each other, began to enter into conversation; the latter asking what had been the dement of their countrymen, or what the merit of the Carthaginians, that could induce Italians to wage war in their favour, - in favour of foreigners and barbarians; in fine, against their antient allies, and striving to reduce Italy to a state of vaffalage, and to make it a tributary province to Africa? The Aipians, in excuse for themselves, declared, that, without knowing any thing of the matter, they had been fold to the Carthaginians by those who had the management of their affairs, and that they were kept in a state of subjection and oppression by a faction of a few. In consequence of this declaration, greater numbers on both fides joined in the conversation. At last the prætor of Aipi was brought by his countrymen to the conful, and mutual affurances being given, in the midst of the standards and troops, the Arpians on a fudden turned their aims against the Carthaginians in favour of the Romans. A body of Spaniards also, nearly a thousand in number, came over to the conful, without stipulating any other condition than that the Carthaginian garrison should be allowed to depart unhurt; which article was punctually fulfilled: the gates were thrown open: they were dismissed in safety, and joined Hanmibal at Salapia. Thus was Arpi restored to the Romans.

Romans, without any other loss than that of the life BOOK of one man, long fince branded with treason, and XXIV. lately with desertion. To the Spaniards a double Y.R. 539. allowance of provisions was ordered; and, on very P.C. 210 many occasions afterwards, the government found them brave and faithful foldiers. While one of the confuls was in Apulia, and the other in Lucania, an hundred and twelve Campanian horsemen, all men of noble birth, having, under pretence of ravaging the enemy's country, obtained leave from the magiftrates to go out of Capua, came to the Roman camp above Suesfula, told the advanced guard who they were, and that they wished to speak with the prætor. Cneius Fulvius, who commanded there, on receiving their message, ordered ten of their number, unarmed, to be conducted into his presence; and having heard their demands, which amounted to no more than that, on Capua being recovered, their property might be restored to them, he received them all into protection. At the same time the other prætor, Sempronius Tuditanus, reduced, by force, the town of Aternum, took above seven thousand prisoners, and a confiderable quantity of brass and filver coin. At Rome a dreadful fire raged during two nights and one day: every thing between the Salinæ and the Carmental gate was levelled to the ground, as were the Æquimælium and the Jugarian The fire, catching the temples of Fortune, of Mother Matuta, and of Hope, on the outfide of the gate, and spreading to a vast extent, consumed a great number of buildings, both religious and private.

XLVIII. During this year, the two Cornelii, Publius and Cneius, by the prosperous course of affairs in Spain, and from their having recovered many old, and acquired many new allies, were encouraged to extend their views to Atrica itself. Syphax, at this time king of a part of Numidia,

BOOK had fuddenly commenced a war with the Car-XXIV. thaginians: to him they fent three centurions as ambaffadors, to form a treaty of friendship and alliance, Y.R. 539 and to affure him, that, if he continued to profecute the war against the Carthaginians, the Roman senate and people would be thankful for the fervice, and would use their best endeavours to repay the kind- > ness afterwards to his entire satisfaction. This embaffy was very acceptable to the barbarian: he entered into convert tion with the ambaffadors on the art of war; and when he heard the discourses of those experienced veterans, and compared his own practice with fuch a regular fystem of discipline, he became fensible of his ignorance in many particulars. Then he requested, as the first instance of that favour, which he might expect from good and faithful allies, that "two of them might carry back to their commanders the result of their embassy, and the other remain with him as his instructor in military " knowledge; adding, that the people of Numidia " were quite unacquainted with the method of fight-" ing on foot, and were ufeful only on horfeback: " that this was the mode practifed by their an-" cestors since their first existence as a nation, and " to the same had the present generation been ac-" customed fince their childhood. That he had to " deal with an enemy whose chief confidence lay in "the power of their infantry; and that, therefore, " if he expected to put himself on an equality with them in point of firm thrength, he must procure a 66 body of foot foldiers to oppose theirs. That his "dominions abounded with numbers of men fit for " the purp se, but that he was totally ignorant of the proper method of arming, training, and mar-" fhalling them; and they were in every respect " awkward and unmarageable, like a mere mob " collected by chance." The ambaffadors aniwered, that they would, at the prefent, comply with his defire, provided he have them an assurance that he would

would fend the person back, in case their com- BOOK manders should disapprove of what they had done. XXIV. The name of him who remained with the king was Y.R.539. Quintus Statorius. With the two centurions, the B.C.213. Numidian fent into Spain ambassadors on his part, to receive the ratification of the convention from the Roman generals; and he charged them, after they should have executed this commission, to persuade the Numidians, who acted as auxiliaries in the Carthaginian garrisons, to come over to the other side. Statorius, finding abundance of young men, raifed an army of infantry for the king, and forming them into distinct bodies, according to the Roman method, taught them, in taking their posts and performing their feveral evolutions, to follow their standards and keep their ranks; and he fo inured them to the practice of military works, and other duties of foldiers, that, in a short time, the king placed not more confidence in his cavalry than in his infantry, and, even in a pitched battle, on a level plain, he defeated an army of Carthaginians. The arrival of the king's ambassadors was productive of great advantages to the Romans in Spain, for, as foon as it was known, the Numidians began to come over in great numbers from the enemy. In this manner did friendship commence between the Romans and Syphax. transaction, as soon as the Carthaginians got notice, they inftantly dispatched ambassadors to Gala, who reigned in the other part of Numidia, over the nation

XLIX. Gala had a fon named Masinissa, at that time only feventeen years old, but endowed with fuch talents as, even then, afforded ftrong prefumption that he would leave the kingdom more extensive and opulent than when he received it. The ambaffadors represented, that, "fince Syphax 66 had united himself with the Romans, for the " purpose of being enabled, by their affistance, to called Massylians.

BOOK " exert greater force against the other kings and XXIV. " natives of Africa, it would be the interest of " Gala to enter into alliance, as foon as possible, with Y.R. 539. . the Carthaginians, on the other fide; that, before B.C. 213. "Syphax passed over into Spain, or the Romans " into Africa, it would be very practicable to over-" power the former, who had, as yet, gained no " advantage from his connexion with Rome, except "the name of it. Gala was eafily perfuaded to take part in the war, especially as his son earnestly solicited the command of the armies; and, in conjunction with the legions of the Carthaginians, he totally defeated Syphax in a great battle, in which, as we are told, thirty thousand men were flain. fled from the field with a few horsemen, and took refuge a rong the Maurusian Numidians, who inhabit the remotest coast of the ocean, opposite to Gades. Here the barbarians, attracted by his fame, flocked to him from all fides, in fuch numbers, that he was foon at the head of a very great army. In order to prevent his carrying this force into Spain, from which he was feparated only by a narrow streight, Masinissa, with his victorious troops, came up with him; and there, by his own strength, without any aid from the Carthaginians, he maintained the war against Syphax with great glory. In Spain nothing memorable was performed, except that the Roman generals brought over to their fide the youth of Celtiberia, granting them the same pay which they had stipulated with the Carthaginians, and fending above three hundred Spaniards of the highest distinction into Italy, to endeavour to draw off their countrymen, who ferved as auxiliaries in Hannibal's army. The only incident which occurred in Spain remarkable enough to deferve being recorded, was, that the Celtiberians, in this year, were the first mercenary troops ever entertained in the Roman armies.

HISTORY OF ROME.

BOOK XXV.

Publius Cornelius Scipio, afterwards called Africanus, elected edile before he had attained the age required by the law. The citadel of Tarentum, in which the Roman garrison had taken refuge, betrayed to Hannibal. Games instituted in bonour of Apollo, called Apollinarian. Quintus Fulvius and Appius Claudius, consuls, defeat Hanno the Carthagi-Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus betrayed by nian general. a Lucanian to Mago, and flain. Centenius Penula, who had been a centurion, asks the senate for the command of an army, promising to engage and vanquish Hannibal; is cut off with eight thousand men. Cneius Fulvius engages Hannibal, and is beaten, with the loss of sixteen thousand men stain; he himself escapes with only two hundred horsemen. Quintus Fulvius and Appius Claudius, consuls, lay siege to Syracuse taken by Claudius Marcellus, after a flege of three years. In the tumult occasioned by taking the city, Archimedes is killed, while intently occupied upon some figures which he had drawn in the fand. Publius and Cornelius Scipio, after having performed many eminent services in Spain, are flain, together with nearly the whole of their armies, eight years after their arrival in that country; and the possession of that province would have been entirely lost, but for the valour and activity of Lucius Marcius, a Roman knight, who, collecting the scattered remains of the vanquished armies, utterly defeats the enemy, storming their two camps, killing thirty-seven thousand of them, and taking eighteen bundred, together with an immense booty.

TANNIBAL passed the summer, during which BOOK XXV. in these events took place in Africa and Spain, in the territory of Tarentum, in continual expectation B.C.213.

BOOK tion of having that city betrayed into his hands. Meanwhile some inconsiderable sowns of that diftricl, with others belonging to the Sallentines, revolted Y.R 539. to him. At the same time, of the twelve Bruttian B.C.213. States which had, a year or two before, gone over to the Carthaginians, the Confentians and Thurians put themselves again under the protection of the Roman people, and more of them would have done the same, had not Lucius Pomponius Veientanus, præfect of the allies, who, in confequence of feveral predatory expeditions in the territory of Bruttium, had acquired an appearance of a segular commander, affembled a tumultuary army, and fought a battle with Hanno. A vast number of his men were killed or taken on the occasion, but they were only an undisciplined rabble of peasants and flaves; and the least part of the loss was the præfet himself being taken among the rest; for, besides his inconfiderate rashness in bringing on this engagement, having been formerly a farmer of the revenue, he had, by every iniquitous practice, proved -faithless and detrimental, both to the state and to the companies concerned in that business. conful Sempronius had many flight skirmishes in Lucania, none worthy of mention, but reducing feveral inconfiderable towns. In proportion as the war was protracted to a greater length, and successes and dilappointments produced various alterations, not only in the fituations, but in the fentiments of men, superstitious observances, and these mostly introduced from abroad, gained fuch ground among the people in general, that it feemed as if either mankind or the deities had undergone a fudden change. And now the customed rites were used, not only in private, and within doors, but in the public streets, the Forum, and the Car These were frequented by crowds of women see ing, and offering prayers to their gods, in hitherto unknown at Rome. A low forted

crificers, and foothfayers, had enflaved the people's BOOK understandings, and the number of these were increased in consequence of the great influx of the pea- Y.R.539. fantry from the country, who, as their lands lay long B.C. 213. untilled by reason of the continuance of the war, and the inroads of the enemy, were driven into the city through want and fear. These found an easy means of profit, in working on the deluded minds of the multitude, which practice they carried on as if it were a lawful occupation. At first, every well-judging person expressed indignation at such proceedings: afterwards, the matter came to be noticed by the fenators, and attracted public censure from the govern-The ædiles, and the judges of criminal captes *, were sharply rebuked by the fenate, for not having prevented these practices, although, when they had attempted to disperse from the Forum the crowd affembled on fuch an occasion, and to remove the implements of their rites, they were in imminent danger of personal injury. The evil now appearing too powerful to be checked by the efforts of the inferior magistrates, the senate gave a charge to Marcus Atilius, prætor of the city, to free the public from those superstitious nuisances. For this purpose, he read their decree in a general affembly; and, at the fame time, gave notice, that " wholoever 44 had any books of divination, and forms of prayer used on such occasions, or the art of sacrificing "in writing, should bring all such books and " writings to him before the calends of April, wand that no person should in any place, either public or confecrated, perform facrifice in any "new or foreign mode."

Several of the priests established by law died year, Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, chief pontiff Papirius Maso, son of Caius, a pontist, Pub iele were three. They were elected by the people to judge al causes, superintend the prisons, and the execution of

lius

BOOK lius Furius Philus, an augur, and Caius Papirius Maso, son of Furius, a decemvir for the direction of religious rites. In the room of Lentulus was substituted, in the college of pontiffs, Marcus Cornelius Cethegus; in that of Papirius, Cneius Servilius Cœpio: Lucius Quintius Flaminius was created augur, and Lucius Cornelius Lentulus decemvir for the direction of religious rites. The time of the confular election now drew nigh; but, as it was not judged expedient to call away the confuls from the war, which they were profecuting with vigour, Tiberius Sempronius, conful, nominated Caius Claudius Centho dictator, to hold the elections, and he appointed Quintus Fulvius Flaccus his mafter of the horse. The dictator, on the first day whereon the affembly could meet, elected confuls Quintus Fulvius Flaccus the master of the horse, and Appins Claudius Pulcher, who had held the government of Sicily, as prætor. Then were elected prætors, Cneius Fulvius Flaccus, Caius Claudius Nero, Marcus Junius Silanus, Publius Cornelius Sulla. foon as the elections were finished, the dictator refigned his office. This year, with Marcus Cornelius Cethegus, Publius Cornelius Scipio, afterwards surnamed Africanus, was curule ædile. The plebeian tribunes opposed the pretensions of the latter to the ædileship, and insisted that he ought not to be admitted as a candidate, because he was not of the age required by law*, on which he answered, "If it is " the will of all the citizens to make me ædile, I am " old enough:" on this, the people haftened into their respective tribes, to give their votes in his favour,

For the quæftorship 31 years. curule ædileship 37 prætorskip -40 confulfhip --

^{*} No person could obtain a curule office until he had served. ten campaigns; and, as the military age commenced at feverateen, a man must be at least twenty-seven before he was qualified to fue for the quæstorship. It seems that by this law the quite ages were fettled thus:

and with such a degree of zeal, that the tribunes at BOOK once relinquished their design. The compliments paid to the public by those ædiles were these: the Y.R. 539. Roman games were exhibited with magnificence, B.C. 213. confidering the circumstances of the times, and repeated during one day; with a donation of a gallon of oil to each street. The plebeian ædiles Lucius Villius Tappulus, and Marcus Fundanius Fundulus, brought before the people a charge of incontinency against a considerable number of matrons, and several who were convicted were driven into exile. The plebeian games were repeated during two days; and, on occasion of these games, a banquet in honour of Jupiter was celebrated.

III. Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, a third time, and Y.R.540. Appius Claudius, entered upon the administration of B.C. 2124 the confulship. The provinces were assigned to the practors by lot; the administration of justice, both to citizens and foreigners, formerly divided between two, now fell to Publius Cornelius Sulla; Apulia was allotted to Cneius Fulvius Flaccus, Sueffula to Caius Claudius Nero, and Ftruria to Marcus Junius It was decreed, that the confuls should conduct the war against Hannibal, and that each should receive two legions, one from Quintus Fabius conful of the former year, the other from Fulvius Centumalus; that, of the prætors, Fulvius Flaccus should command those legions which were at Luceria, under the prætor Æmilius, and Claudius Nero those which were in Picenum under Caius Terentius, and that they themselves should raise recruits to fill up the numbers of their respective armies. To Marcus Junius, for the fervice in Etruria, were given the two city legions of the preceding Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus and Publius Sempronius Tuditanus were continued in command of their provinces, Lucania and Gaul, with the fame forces as before; as was Publius Lentulus in ١,4

Y.R.540.

BOOK the old Roman province in Sicily.; Marcus Marcellus in Syracuse, and the late dominions of Hiero; Titus Otacilius in the command of the fleet, Mar-B.C. 212. cus Valerius in that of Greece, Quintus Mucius Scævola in that of Sardinia, and the two Cornelii, Publius and Cneius, in that of Spain. In addition to the troops already on foot, two city legions were levied by the confuls, the number of these this year being raifed to twenty-three. The behaviour of Marcus Postumius Pyrgensis impeded these levies of the confuls, and went very near exciting a great and general commotion. This man was a farmer of the revenue, and for many years had not, in the whole empire, any equal in fraud and avarice, excepting Lucius Pomponius Veientanus, who was made prisoner by the Carthaginians under Hanno, while he was inconfiderately ravaging the lands of Lucania. As the public were to undergo any loss of the supplies sent for the use of the armies, which should be occasioned by storm, these two had fabricated accounts of pretended shipwreck; and even fuch as they reported with a degree of truth, had happened through their own fraudulent contrivance, not through accident. Having put a few goods, of little worth, on board of old shattered vessels, they funk these in the deep, after taking out the failors into boats prepared for the purper, and then made a false return of the cargoes, as of much more confiderable value than they really were. A discovery of this fraud had been made the year before to Marcus Atilius the prætor, and by him communicated to the fenate; but still no vote of censure had passed on it, because the senators were unwilling to disoblige, at such a time as that, the body of revenue farmers. The affembly of the people, however, proved a more strict avenger of it; and two plebeian tribunes, Spurius and Lucius Carvilius, exerting themselves at last, when they law that such conduct was become generally odious and fcandalous.

scandalous, proposed a fine on Marcus Postumius of BOOK two hundred thousand asses in weight *. When the XXV. day arrived on which the cause was to be argued, Y.R.540. such vast numbers of the commons attended the as- B.C. 212. fembly, that the area of the Capitol could scarcely contain them; and when the pleadings were finished, the only hope which the defendant seemed to have, was, that Caius Servilius Casca, a plebeian tribune, his near relation and intimate friend, should interpose a protest, before the tribes were called on for their opinions. After the witnesses had been examined, the tribunes defired the people to withdraw, and the urn was brought, in order that the tribes should draw lots, and then proceed to determine the matter. Meanwhile the revenue farmers urged Casca to stop the proceedings for that day, at which the commons loudly declared their displeasure, and Casca happening to fit foremost at a front corner of the Rostrum, his mind was highly agitated at once by fear and shame. Finding no support in him, the revenue farmers, for the purpose of obstructing the business, rushed, in a compact body, into the space which had been cleared by the withdrawing of some, wrangling at the fame time with the remaining people and with the tribunes. The dispute now seemed likely to proceed to violence, when the conful Fulvius faid to the tribunes, "Do you not fee that your " authority is annihilated, and that an infurrection "will probably be the consequence, unless you "quickly dismiss the affembly of the commons?"

IV. The commons were accordingly difmiffed; and the confuls, having affembled the fenate, required their judgment concerning the interruption given to the affembly of the people, and the audacious violence of the revenue farmers, representing at the fame time, that " Marcus Furius Camillus, whose

^{* 645]. 169. 8}d.

BOOK " banishment was followed by the downfall of the " city, had submitted to a sentence of condemnation, passed on him by his angry countrymen. Y.R.540. "That, before him, the decemvirs, whole laws B.C. 212. were the public rule of conduct to the present " day, and, afterwards, many of the most distin-"guished personages in the state, had yielded "themselves to the public judgment. But Pos-"tumius, an obscure individual of Pyrgi, had " wrested from the Roman people their right " of fuffrage; had diffolved an affembly of the " common, annihilated the authority of the tri-"bunes, arrayed a band of men, and feized " on a post, with design to cut off all comee munication between the commons and their stribunes, and to prevent the tribes being salled " to vote. That nothing had restrained the people " from riot and bloodshed, but the calmness and " moderation of the magistrates, in giving way " for the time to the desperate audaciousness of a " few, in suffering themselves and the Roman people to be overcome, and rather than an occasion should " be given to those, who wished for a riot, dissolv-" ing, according to the defendant's defire, the af-" fembly, whose proceedings he intended to hinder " by force of arms." Every man of character reprobated fuch conduct as its heinousness deserved, and a decree of the fenate was passed, declaring such violent outrage treason against the state, and of pernicious example; on which the Carvilii, plebeian tribunes, defisting from the profecution of the fine, immediately brought forward a capital accusation against Postumius, and ordered, that unless he gave bail, he should be taken into custody by the beadle, and carried to prison. Postumius, after giving bail, did not appear. The tribunes then proposed to the commons, and the commons passed this order, that (46 if Marcus Postumius did not appear before the " calends of May, and, being fummoned on that

"day, did not answer to the charge, or shew suffi- BOOK cient cause for his non-appearance, he should be " adjudged an exile, his goods should be confiscated, " and himself interdicted from fire and water "." They then proceeded to profecute on capital charges, and compelled to give bail, each of those who had fomented the tumult and disorder. At first, they threw into prison such as could not find security, and afterwards, even fuch as could; to avoid the danger of which treatment, most of those concerned went into exile. Such were the confequences of the fraud of the revenue farmers, and of their daring attempt to screen themselves from punishment.

V. An affembly was then held for the election of a chief pontiff, at which Marcus Cornelius Cethegus, the new pontiff, prefided. Three candidates maintained a very obstinate contest, Quintus Fulvius Flaccus, now a third time conful, who had formerly ferved the office of cenfor; Titus Manlius Torquatus, distinguished likewise by two consulships and the cenforthip; and Publius Licinius Crassus, who was also to solicit for the office of curule ædile. The latter, young as he was, gained a complete victory over his competitors in this difpute, notwithstanding their advantages in respect of years, and the honours with which they were decorated. Before him there had not occurred, in the course of an hundred and twenty years, an instance of any person who had not fat in a curule chair, being created chief pontiff, excepting Publius Cornelius Caluffa. Although the confuls found it very difficult to complete the levies of young men

^{*} There was no law which authorised the sentencing a Roman citizen, directly, to banishment: but by the interdiction abovementioned, the criminal was deprived of every right of a citizen; and, it being declared unlawful to fupply him with any necessary. he was compelled to go into exile.

BOOK for the purposes of filling up vacancies in the old XXV. legions and raising new ones for the city, yet the fenate forbade them to cease their endeavours, and B.C. 212. ordered two fets of triumvirs to be appointed, one of which within, and the other beyond, the distance of fifty miles, should inspect into the number of free-born men in all the market-towns and villages, and enlift fuch for foldiers as had strength enough to carry arms, though they should not yet have attained the regular age for fervice; and that "the plebeian "tribunes would be pleased to propose to the peo-" ple the passing of an order, That all persons under " the age of seventeen years, who should take the " military oath, should be allowed their years of " fervice, in like manner as if they had been of "the age of feventeen, or older, when enlifted." In pursuance of this decree of the senate, two sets of triumvirs were appointed, who enlifted free-born youths in every part of the country.

> VI. At this time a letter was read in the fenate, written from Sicily by Marcus Marcellus, relative to a request of the troops serving under Publius Lentulus. This army confisted of those who had been in the battle of Cannæ; they had been fent abroad into Sicily, as mentioned before, under a rule, that they should not be brought home to Italy before the conclusion of the Carthaginian war. With the permission of Lentulus, they fent the most respectable among the horsemen and centurions, and a chosen number of the legionary infantry as deputies to Marcus Marcellus, to his winter-quarters; and, when they were admitted to an audience, one of them addressed him in this manner: "Marcus Marcellus, we would have carried 46 our remonstrances into Italy to you, while you were conful, immediately after the passing of that " fevere, if we may not call it unjust, decree of the fenate concerning us, had we not entertained the "hope, that being fent into a province full of dif- BOO'K "turbance, in consequence of the death of their XXV. " kings, to maintain a war of difficulty against the Y.R.540. " united forces of the Sicilians and Carthaginians, B.C. 212. " we might, by our wounds and blood, have made 66 satisfaction to the anger of the senate, as, in the " memory of our fathers, our countrymen, taken " by Pyrrhus at Heraclea, made atonement by " their exertions in arms against the same Pyrrhus. "Yet, Conscript Fathers, for what demerit on our " part did you then conceive, or do you now re-" tain, displeasure against us? Addressing you, Mar-" cus Marcellus, I confider myfelf as addreffing both " the confuls and the whole fenate; for had you been " our conful at Cannæ, both our affairs and those " of the public would have been in a happier state. " Suffer me then, I befeech you, before I complain " of the hardship of our situation, to clear ourselves " of the guilt which is laid to our charge. If the " cause of our ruin at Cannæ was not the wrath of "the gods, nor the decree of fate, under whose 66 laws the immutable feries of human events is " carried on in a regular chain, but misconduct in " some, to whom, I pray you, is that misconduct to " be imputed? To the foldiers, or to the com-" manders? As a foldier, I shall certainly never fay " any thing of my commander, especially since I " know that thanks have been given him by the " fenate, for not having despaired of the common-" wealth, and that, fince his flight from Cannæ, he " has been continued in command through every " fucceeding year. We have heard, moreover, "that others who faved their lives on that melan-"choly occasion, and who were then our military tri-"bunes, fue for, and administer offices of honour, " and hold the command of provinces: Is it, Con-" fcript Fathers, that you eafily grant pardon to " yourselves, and to your offspring, while you inexorably pour vengeance on our worthless heads?

T 3

BOOK "Was it no diffrace for a conful, and other chiefs

" of the state, to fly, when no other hope was " left; and did you fend your foldiers into the Y.R.540. "field, under a particular obligation to die there? B.C. 212. " neid, under a particular army fled; at the Allia, almost the whole army fled; at 66 the Caudine Forks, the troops, without even attempting opposition, surrendered to the enemy; 46 not to mention other and shameful defeats. "Nevertheless, so far were these armies from 66 having any mark of ignominy contrived for "them, that the city of Rome was recovered 66 by means of those very troops who had fled "from the Allia to Veii; and the Caudine legions, " who had returned without arms to Rome, being " fent back armed into Samnium, fent under the 66 yoke that very enemy who had fo lately ex-" ulted in their difgrace. But can any one make a " charge of cowardice, or running away, on the troops who fought in the battle of Cannæ, " which more than fifty thousand men fell; from "which the conful made his escape with only se-" venty horsemen; and from which no one brought " away his life, who does not owe it to the enemy's 66 being fatigued with killing? At the time when " the proposal of ransoming the prisoners was re-" jected, people, in general, bestowed praises on " us, for having referved ourselves for the use of " the commonwealth, for having gone back to the " conful to Venusia, and formed an appearance of " a regular army. Now we are in a worse condition than were those taken by an enemy in the time of our fathers: for, in their case, there was only es an alteration made in their arms, in their station in the army, and in the place where they were to " pitch their tents in camp; all which, however, they reversed, at once, by a strenuous exertion " in the service of the public, by one successful " battle. None of them were fent into banishment; " not one was precluded from the hope of ferving

" out his legal term, and gaining a discharge; in BOOK "fhort, they were brought face to face with an XXV. " enemy, in fighting whom they might at once put Y.R.540. " an end either to their life or their dishonour. B.C. 212. "We, to whom nothing can be imputed, except " that our conduct was the cause that any one " Roman foldier furvived the battle of Cannæ, are " driven away to a distance, not only from our na-" tive country, and from Italy, but even from an " enemy, to a place where we may grow old in " exile, shut out from all hope, all opportunity of " obliterating our difgrace, or of appealing the "wrath of our countrymen, or, in fine, of dying " with honour. However, we feek not either an " end of our ignominy, or the rewards of valour; "we defire only permission to give a proof of our " fpirit, and to exercise our courage; we seek la-" bour and danger, that we may discharge the "duties of men, and of foldiers. This is now the " fecond year, during which war is maintained in " Sicily with great vigour on both fides; the Car-"thaginians conquer some cities, the Romans " others; armies of infantry; and of cavalry, en-" gage in battle; the operations are carried on at " Syracuse by land and by sea; we plainly hear the " shouts of the combatants, and the din of their " arms, while we lie inactive and torpid, as if we " had neither hands nor armour. With legions " composed of flaves, the conful Tiberius Sempronius " fought many pitched battles: they enjoy the fruits of their labour, freedom, and the rights of citizens. " Let us be confidered at least as slaves, purchased " for the purpole of the present war. " allowed to face the enemy, and to acquire free-"dom in battle. Do you choose to try our courage " on fea, or on land; in the field, or in affaulting " towns? Our petition is for the most arduous en-" terprifes, the greatest labour, and the utmost danger:

T 4

BOOK "ger: that what ought to have happened at Cannæ, XXV. "may happen as foon as possible, fince the whole remainder of our lives, from that day, has been B.C. 212. "doomed to shame."

VII. At the conclusion of this speech they proftrated themselves at Marcellus's feet. Marcellus told them, that a business of that fort lay not within his authority, or his power; that he would write to the fenate, and govern himfelf, in every particular, by the judgment of that body. His letter on the fubject was brought to the new confuls, and read by them in the fenate, when the matter being taken into confideration, a decree was passed to this purpose, that "the senate saw no reason why the interests of the commonwealth should be intrusted " to men who had deferted their fellow-foldiers in 66 battle at Cannæ. That if Marcus Claudius, the or proconful, was of a different opinion, he should " act as he might judge confistent with the public " good, and his own honour; provided that none of " those persons should be excused from labour, or " receive any military present in reward of courage, " or be brought home to Italy while the enemy had " any footing there." After this, in pursuance of a decree of the fenate, and an order of the people, an affembly of election was held by the city prætor. in which were created five commissioners for repairing the walls and towers, and two fets of triumvirs; one, to fearch for the effects belonging to the temples, and register the offerings; the other, to repair the temples of Fortune, and Mother Matuta, within the Carmental gate, and likewise that of Hope, on the outfide of the gate, which had been confumed by fire the year before. There were dreadful storms at this time: on the Alban mount, a shower of stones lasted, without intermission, for two days; many places were struck with lightning;

two buildings in the Capitol, the rampart of the BOOK camp above Suessula, in many places, and two of XXV. the men on guard were killed. A wall and fome Y.R. 540. towers at Cumz were not only struck, but demo- B.C.212. lished by lightning. At Reate, a huge rock was feen to fly about, and the fun appeared more red than usual, and of a colour like blood. On account of these prodigies there was a supplication for one day, the confuls employing themselves, for several others, in the performance of religious rites; at the fame time folemn worship was performed, during nine days. The revolt of the Tarentines, after having been long hoped for by Hannibal, and apprehended by the Romans, happened to be accelerated by a cause which originated at a distance: a Tarentine, named Phileas, had been a long time at Rome under the pretext of political business. Being a man of a restless disposition, and conceiving that he was losing his active powers during his stay in that city, he contrived to gain access to the hostages from Tarentum, who were kept in the court of the Temple of Liberty, and guarded with the less care, because it was not the interest either of themselves or of their state to impose upon the Romans. Having, after frequent conversations, procured their concurrence in his scheme, and bribed two of their keepers, he brought them out of their confinement in the beginning of the night, and fled in company with them. As foon as day arrived, the news of their escape spread through the city, and a party, sent in pursuit of them, seized them all at Tarracina, and brought them back. They were led into the Comitium, and with the approbation of the people scourged with rods, and thrown down from the rock.

VIII. The cruelty of this punishment exasperated the inhabitants of the two most considerable Grecian cities in Italy, both as communities, and as individuals

BOOK dividuals connected in relation, or friendship, with the persons thus put to death. A conspiracy was formed in consequence, by about thirteen of B.C 212, the young nobility at Tarentum, at the head of whom were Nico and Philemenus. Judging it neccffary, before they took any step, to confer with Hannibal, they went out of the city by night, under pretence of hunting, and repaired to the place where he lay. When they came within a small distance of his camp, the rest concealed themselves in a wood near the road, while Nico and Philemenus, proceeding to the advanced guard, were taken into custody, and, at their own request, conducted into the presence of Hannibal. When they had laid before him the reasons for their undertaking, and what they intended to perform, they received high commendations, and a profusion of promises; and were defired, in order to make their countrymen believe that they came out of the city in fearch of plunder, to drive home before them fome cattle belonging to the Carthaginians, which had been turned into pasture; at the same time, assurance was given them, that they might do it with safety, and without a dispute. Such a booty acquired by the young men was much noticed, and people wondered the less at their frequently repeating the same kind of enterprise. At another meeting with Hannibal, a covenant was folemnly ratified, that the Tarentines should, together with freedom, retain their own laws, and all their rights: that they should neither pay any kind of tribute to the Carthaginians, nor, without their own consent, receive a garrison from them; but that the present garrisons, when overpowered, should be put into the hands of the Carthaginians. After the terms were thus fettled, Philemenus continued his practice of going out, and returning into the city, by night, with still greater frequency, attended by dogs and

and other requisites for hunting, of which he was BOOK remarkably fond; then, bringing home fomething, XXV. which he either took himself in the chace, or Y.R.540. carried off from the enemy, who laid it purposely B.C. 212. in his way, he generally presented it to the commander, or to the watchmen at the gates, who supposed that he chose to pass particularly by night, through fear of furprize. When this practice had now become so customary, that, at whatever time of night he gave the fignal by a whiftle, the gate would be opened, Hannibal thought it was time to put their defign into execution. He lay at the distance of three days' journey, and, in order that his keeping his camp fixed in one and the fame spot, for such a length of time, might create the less wonder, feigned himself sick. Even the Romans in garrison at Tarentum had now ceased to look with fuspicion on his remaining so long inactive.

IX. But when he determined to go on to Tarentum, choosing out of the infantry and cavalry ten thousand men, who, in activity of body, and lightness of their armour, seemed best qualified for expedition, he began his march at the fourth watch of the night; having first detached about eighty Numidian horsemen, with orders to scour the country on each fide of the road, examining every place carefully, left any of the people who might obferve his approach from a distance should escape: to bring back fuch as were before them on the way, and to kill all whom they met, in order that the neighbouring inhabitants might have reason to suppose it a plundering party, rather than an army. Hannibal, after marching with rapid speed, pitched his camp at the distance of about fifteen miles from Tarentum: nor did he, even there, discover to the soldiers their destination, only giving it in charge not to fuffer any one to turn aside, or quit the line; and, above and to do nothing without the command of their officers; adding, that in due time he would let B.C. 212. them know what he wished to be done. About the fame hour, a report had reached Tarentum. that a small number of Numidian horsemen were ravaging the lands, and had spread terror among the inhabitants through a great part of the country: but the Roman commander paid no farther regard to this intelligence, than to order a party of cavalry to go out very early next morning, to stop these depredations; and, so far was he from increasing his vigilance in other respects, that, on the contrary, he confidered this inroad of the Numidians as a proof, that Hannibal and his army had not stirred from their camp. Early in the night. the Carthaginian put his troops in motion, and Philemenus, with his usual burthen, taken in hunting, ferved him as a guide, while the rest of the conspirators waited for the concerted signals. It had been fettled among them, that Philemenus, bringing in his game through the gate where he was accustomed to pass, should introduce some men in arms, while Hannibal should, on another side, approach the gate called Temenis, which, being about the middle of the land fide, faced towards the east, and near which, within the walls, stood fome tombs, where Nico waited his arrival. approaching the place, Hannibal, according agreement, raifed up a fire, and made it blaze. The fame fignal was returned by Nico, and then the fires were extinguished on both sides. Hannibal led on his men in filence to the gate. Nico, falling fuddenly on the guards, who were fast asleep, flew them in their beds, and threw the gate open. Hannibal then entered with his infantry, but ardered the cavalry to halt without, in order that if occasion should require, they might have open ground to act in. At the same time, Philemenus, on the other fide, drew nigh the postern through BOOK which he had usually passed, and his signal, which XXV. had now become familiar, with his well known voice, Y.R.540. faying that he was hardly able to bear the weight B.C. 212. of a huge beaft he had killed, foon brought out a watchman, and the gate was opened. While two young men carried in a boar, he himself followed with a huntsman unincumbered, and while the watchman, aftonished at the fize of the animal, turned incautiously to those who carried it, he ran him through with a hunting spear. About thirty armed men then pushed in, slew the rest of the watchmen. and broke open the next gate, through which a band of foldiers in array immediately burst in. These were conducted thence, in filence, to the Forum, and there joined Hannibal. The Carthaginian now fent the Tarentines of his party, with two thoufand Gauls, formed in three divisions, through the feveral parts of the city with orders to take possession of the most frequented streets, and, on a tumult arising, to kill the Romans every where, and spare the townsmen. But to render this practicable, he gave direction to the young Tarentines, that whenever they saw any of their countrymen at a distance, they should bid them be quiet and filent, and fear nothing.

BOOK all, to keep their attention alert to receive orders, Y.R.540.

X. Now all was tumult and uproar as usual in a city newly taken, but how occasioned, no one knew with certainty. The Tarentines supposed, that the Romans had rifen in arms to fack the city; the Romans, that an infurrection, with fome treacherous intent, had taken place among the townsmen. The commander, being roused at the beginning of the disturbance, sled away to the pert, and getting into a boat was carried round to the citadel. The consternation was increased by the found of a trumpet heard from the theatre: it was a Roman one, procured before hand by the confpirators

BOOK conspirators for this purpose, and being unskilfully blown by a Greek, it was impossible to discover who gave that fignal, or to whom it was given. Y.R. 540. Who gave that fignal, or to whom it was given. B.C. 212. When day appeared, the fight of the Carthaginian and Gallic arms removed all doubt from the minds of the Romans; and, on the other fide, the Greeks feeing these lie slaughtered in every quarter, perceived that the city was taken by Hannibal. When the light became more clear, and the Romans, who furvived the carnage, had fled into the citadel, • the tumult began gradually to fubfide, then Hannibal ordered the Tarentines to be called together without their arms. They all attended, fome few excepted, who had accompanied the Romans in their retreat into the citadel, resolved to share every fortune with them. Here Hannibal addressed the Tarentines in terms of much kindness; reminded them of his behaviour to their countrymen, whom he had taken at the Trasimenus or Cannæ, inveighing, at the fame time, against the overbearing tyranny of the Romans. He then ordered each to retire to his own house, and to write his name on the door; because, on a fignal shortly to be given, he would order every house, not so inscribed, to be plundered; adding, that if any should write his name on the habitation of a citizen of Rome, (for the Romans lived in houses of their own,) he should be treated as an enemy. The affembly was then dismissed, and as foon as the doors were marked with inscriptions, so as to distinguish the houses of friends from those of enemies, the signal was given, and the troops spread themselves through all parts of the town to plunder the quarters of the Romans, in which a confiderable booty was found.

> XI. On the following day, he led on his forces to attack the citadel; but found, that on the fide towards the sea, which flows almost round it, forming it into a peninfula, it was defended by very high rocks, rocks, and, on the fide towards the town, by a BOOK wall, and a very large ditch; and that confequently it was impregnable, either in the way of affault, or Y.R.540. by regular approaches. Not choosing either to be B.C. 212. detained from more important business, by taking on himself the care of defending the Tarentines, or in case he left them without a strong garrison, to put it in the power of the Romans to attack them from the citadel whenever they pleased, he determined to cut off the communication between the citadel and the city by a rampart. Besides, he entertained some hopes, that the Romans, attempting to hinder this, might be brought to an engagement, and that, should they fally forth with more than ordinary eagerness, great numbers of them might be cut off, and the strength of the garrison thereby reduced to fuch a degree, that the Tarentines could alone defend the city against them. As soon as the work was begun, the garrison, suddenly throwing open one of the gates, made an attack on the workmen. The guard there stationed suffered themfelves to be beaten off, in order that the others might grow bolder on fuccess, and that great numbers of them might join the purfuit, and advance to a greater distance. This they did: when on a fignal given, the Carthaginians, whom Hannibal had kept in readiness for this purpose, rushed forward on all fides. The Romans were unable to withstand their onfet; while the narrowness of the ground, and the difficulties caused by the part of the work already begun, and the implements collected for carrying it on, obstructed their hasty slight, so that most of them tumbled headlong into the ditch, and more lives were thus lost than in the battle. The work was then carried on without any farther obstruction. A ditch of vast dimensions was dug, and on the inner fide of that a rampart thrown up. It was refolved likewise to add at a small distance behind, and in the same direction, a wall, so that even with-

BOOK out a garrison the townsmen might be able to secure themselves against any attack of the Romans. Hannibal, however, left a company to ferve as Y.R.540. B.C.212. fuch, and at the fame time to affift in completing the wall; and then, marching out with the rest of his forces, he encamped at the river Galesus, about five miles distant from the city. From this post he returned to inspect the work, and finding that it had advanced much more briskly than he had expected, conceived hopes of being able even to make himself master of the citadel, which is not fecured, like other fortresses of the kind, by height of fituation, but built on level ground, and divided from the city only by a wall and a trench. The approaches were now pushed forward with every kind of machinery, when a reinforcement, fent from Metapontum, inspired the Romans with courage to affail the works of the enemy, by furprife, in the night. Some of them they levelled, others they destroyed by fire, and this put an end to Hannibal's attacks on the citadel in that quarter. His only prospect of success was now in a blockade, and that not very flattering, because the citadel, being feated on a peninfula, commanded the entrance of the harbour, and had the fea open; while the city was of course debarred from the importation of provisions, and the besiegers were in more danger of want, than the besieged. Hannibal, calling together the chiefs of the Tarentines, enumerated all the present difficulties, and added, that "he could neither see any way of storm-" ing so strong a fortress, nor place any hope in a " blockade, as long as the enemy had the com-" mand of the sea. But if he were possessed of " ships, by means of which he could prevent the " introduction of fupplies, the garrifon would " fpeedily either abandon the place, or furrender." In this the Tarentines agreed with him, but they were of opinion, that "he who offered the counsel

" ought likewise to offer aid to put it in execution: BOOK " fe, if the Carthaginian ships were called over XXV. "from Sicily, they would be able to effect the Y.R.540. purpose; as to their own, which were shut up B.C.212. " in a narrow creek, how could they, while the enemy commanded the harbour's mouth, ever " make their way into the open fea?"-" They " shall make their way," said Hannibal: " many "things, difficult in their nature, are made easy by "good management. Your city lies in a plain; " very wide and level roads stretch out to every " fide; by that which runs across the middle of "the city, from the harbour to the fea, I will, with-" out much labour, carry over your ships on wag-"gons. The sea, now in possession of the foe, will "then be ours; we will invest the citadel on that " fide, and on this by land; or rather, we will 66 shortly take possession of it, for the garrison 66 will either abandon it, or furrender themselves " with it." This discourse excited not only hopes of the defign being accomplished, but the highest admiration of the general's skill. Immediately waggons were collected from all parts, and fastened together; machines were applied to haul up the ships, and the road was repaired, in order that the vehicles might meet the less obstruction in passing. Beasts for drawing, with a number of men, were then procured; the work was commenced with briskness, fo that, in a few days, the fleet, equipped and manned, failed round the citadel, and cast anchor just before the mouth of the harbour. Atte Hannibal left affairs at Tarentum, and returned to his winter-quarters. Whether the defection of the Tarentines took place in this, or the preceding year, authors are not agreed: the greater number, and those who lived nearest to the time of these transactions, represent it as having happened as here ftated.

BOOK XXV. Y.R.540. B C.212.

XII. At Rome, the Latine festival detained the confuls and prætors until the fifth of the calends of May: on that day, having completed the folemnities on the mount, they let out for their respective provinces. A new perplexity, respecting religious matters, afterwards occurred, arising from the divinations of Marcius. This Marcius had been a celebrated foothfayer, and when, in the preceding year, an inquiry after fuch books as regarded them was, made, according to the decree of the senate, his had come into the hands of Marcus Atilius, the city prætor, who was employed in that business, and he had handed them over to the new prætor Sulla. two predictions of this Marcius, one, on account of its verity, for it was actually fulfilled, procured credit to the other, the time of whose completion had not vet arrived. In the former of these, the defeat at Cannæ was foretold, nearly in these words: " Ro-" man of Trojan race, fly the river Cannæ, lest fo-" reigners compel thee to fight in the plain of Dio-" mede. But thou wilt not believe me until thou " fillest the plain with blood, and the river carry " many of thy thousands slain from the fruitful land " into the great fea. To fishes, and birds, and beafts of prey inhabiting the earth, to thefe, thy flesh " be food. For fo has Jupiter faid to me." Those who had ferved in the army in those parts recollected the plains of the Argive Diomede and the river Canna, as well as the defeat itself. The other prophecy was then read: it was more obfcure; and the expression more perplexed:-- Romans, if you "wish to expel the enemy, and the ulcer which " has come from afar, I direct, that games be " vowed to Apollo, and that they be performed " in honour of that deity, every year, with cheer-" fulness. When the people shall have granted a " particular fum out of the public fund, let pri-" vate persons contribute, each according to his " ability. 11

"ability. At the performance of these games, BOOK " that prætor will prefide who shall hold the su- XXV. " preme administration of justice in respect to the Y.R. 540. people and commons. Let the decemvirs facri- B.C.212. " fice victims after the Grecian mode. If you do "these things properly you shall ever rejoice, and " your state will improve; for Apollo will extir-" pate your foes who quietly feed on your plains." They took one day to explain this prophecy, and on the following, a decree of the fenate was passed. that the decemvirs should examine the books concerning the performance of games and facrifices to Apollo. When the examination was made, and the refult reported to the fenate, they voted, that " games should be vowed to Apollo, and that when "these should be finished, ten thousand ases in "weight * should be given to the prætor to defray "the expences of the public worship, and also two " victims of the larger fort." By another decree they ordered, that "the decemvirs should facrifice " according to the Grecian rites, and with the fol-" lowing victims: to Apollo, with a gilded steer: " to Diana, with two white gilded goats; and to "Latona, with a gilded heifer." The prætor, when about to exhibit the games in the great circus, published a proclamation, that the people should, during those games, pay in their contributions, proportioned to their ability, for the service of Apollo. This was the origin of the Apollinarian games, which were vowed and performed for the attaining of fuccess, and not of health, as is generally supposed. At the exhibition of the games all wore garlands, the matrons made supplications, and people in general feasted in the courts of their houses, with their doors open; and the day was folemnized with every kind of religious ceremony.

32l. 58. 10d.

Y.R. 540. ter B.C. 212.

XIII. While Hannibal was in the neighbourhood of Tarentum, both the confuls continued in Samnium, shewing every appearance of an intention to beliege Capua. The inhabitants of that city began already to feel a calamity, usually attendant on long fieges, a famine, the consequence of their having been hindered by the Roman armies from tilling their lands. They therefore fent deputies to Hannibal, intreating that, before the confuls should march the legions into their country, and all the roads should be occupied by their parties, he would order corn to be conveyed into Capua from the neighbouring places. On this, fannibal immediately commanded Hanno to march away with his army from Bruttium into Campania, and to take care that the Capuans should be well supplied with corn. Hanno, on leaving Bruttium, was careful to avoid the camps of the enemy, and the confuls who were in Samnium; and coming near Beneventum, encamped on an elevated spot, three miles from that From thence he issued orders that the corn collected in the fummer should be brought in from the states of that country, who were of his party, to his camp, and appointed troops to escort the convoys. He then fent an express to the Capuans, fixing a day on which they should attend, to receive the corn, with the carriages of all kinds, and beafts of burthen, which they could collect. This business the Campanians conducted with their usual carelessness and indolence; little more than forty carriages were fent, and with them a few beafts of burthen: for which they were sharply rebuked by Hanno, who observed, that even hunger, which kindled a spirit in dumb beafts, could not stimulate those people to active diligence; however, he appointed another day, when they were to come for the corn with more fufficient means of conveyance. The people of Beneventum

Beneventum being informed of every particular of BOOK these transactions, instantly dispatched ten deputies XXV. to the confuls encamped near Bovianum, who, Y.R.540. as foon as they heard what was going on at B.C.212. Capua, agreed between themselves, that one of them should lead his army into Campania; and, accordingly Fulvius, to whose lot that province had fallen, setting out by night, marched into the town of Beneventum. Here, the distance being short, he quickly learned, that Hanno had gone out with a division of his army to forage; that the business of delivering the corn to the Capuans was managed by a quæstor; that two thousand carts had arrived, attended by a diforderly unarmed rabble; that every thing was done with hurry and confusion, and that the regularity of a camp, and military fubordination were entirely banished by the intermixture of fuch a number of peafants. This intelligence being fufficiently authenticated, the conful issued orders that the soldiers should get in readiness, against the next night, their standards and arms, as he intended to attack the Carthaginian camp. Leaving all their knapsacks and baggage at Beneventum, they began their march at the fourth watch; and arriving, a little before day, at the camp, struck such terror there, that if it had stood on level ground, they might undoubtedly have taken it at the first assault: it was protected by the height of its fituation, and its fortifications, which could not be approached on any fide, except by a steep and difficult afcent.

XIV. At the dawn of day a furious battle commenced: the Carthaginians not only maintained their rampart, but, having the advantage of the ground, tumbled down the enemy as they climbed up the fleeps; nevertheless, the obstinate courage of the latter overcame all obstacles, and they made their way

Y.R.540.

BOOK way in feveral parts at once up to the rampart and trenches, but at the expence of many wounds, and a great loss of men. The conful, therefore, call-B.C.212. ing together the military tribunes, told them, that "this inconsiderate attempt must be given up, " and that he judged it the fafer course to carry " back the army, immediately, to Beneventum, " and then, on the day following, to pitch his " camp so close to that of the enemy, as to put " it out of the power, either of the Campanians to " go out, or of Hanno to return into it; and " that, in order to effect this with the greater eafe, " he should send for his colleague, and the army " under his command; and that they should di-" rect their whole force to that point." This plan of the general was disconcerted, after the retreat began to found, by the shouts of the soldiers, expressing their scorn of such pusillanimous orders. Close to one of the enemy's gates was a Pelignian cohort, whose commander, Vibius Accuæus, snatched the standard, and threw it over the rampart; uttering imprecations on himself and the cohort, if they left their enfign in the hands of the enemy. He then rushed forwards, across the ditch and rampart, into the camp. The Pelignians now fought within the rampart, when Valerius Flaccus, a military tribune of the third legion, began upbraiding the Romans with dastardly behaviour, in yielding up to the allies the honour of taking the camp. On this, Titus Pedanius, first centurion, and who commanded the first century, fnatching the enfign from the standard-bearer, cried out, "this standard too, and I your centurion, will instantly be within the rampart; let those follow who wish to save the same from falling into the "eaemy's hands." Then croffing the ditch, he was followed, first, by the men of his own century, and, afterwards, by the whole legion. The conful now, feeing them mount the rampart, altered his defign, and and instead of calling off the troops, exerted himself BOOK to incite and animate them; representing the immi- XXV. nent hazard and danger to which that very gallant Y.R 540. cohort of their allies, and a legion of their own B.C. 212. countrymen, were exposed. On which they, one and all, with the utmost ardour, regardless whether the ground was easy or difficult, pushed onwards through every obstacle; and, in spite of the showers of weapons, which fell on every fide, and of all the opposition which the enemy with their arms and bodies could give them, forced their way in. even of the wounded, and of those whose blood and Arength began to fell them, struggled forward, that they might fall in the camp of the enemy. It was entered therefore in as short a space as if it had stood in a plain, and had no fortification to protect it. armies being now shut up together within the rampart, the fequel was a carnage, not a fight: upwards of fix thousand of the enemy were slain, and above feven thousand taken, together with the Campanians who came for the corn, and all their train of waggons and beafts of burthen. There was also great abundance of other booty, which Hanno and his plunderers had collected out of the lands of the states in alliance with the Roman people. After demolishing the enemy's camp, the army returned to Beneventum, and there the confuls (for Appius Claudius came thither in a few days after), divided and fold the spoil. Those who were chiefly instrumental in this affair, particularly Accuæus the Pelignian, and Titus Pedanius first centurion of the third legion, received honorary presents. Hanno, who was then at Caminium, in the territory of Cæres, on being informed of the loss of his camp, returned with the small party of foragers which he had with him, into Bruttium, in a manner more like a flight than a march.

BOOK Y.R.540.

XV. The Campanians, when informed of the XXV. disaster which had fallen on them and their allies. dispatched deputies to Hannibal, to acquaint him, B.C. 212. that "the two confuls were at Beneventum, within 66 one day's march of Capua; fo that the war e might almost be said to be close to their gates 44 and walls. That unless he afforded them speedy " fuccour, Capua would fall into the enemy's power 46 in a shorter time than Arpi had done. even Tarentum, taken in its whole extent, not to 66 speak of its citadel, ought not to be deemed of "fuch confequence, as to induce him to neglect " the defence of Capua, (a city which he used to " compare to Carthage,) and to throw it into the " hands of the Roman people." Hannibal promiled to pay due attention to the affairs of the Campanians; and, for the prefent, fent with their deputies a body of two thouland horsemen, to affist them in protecting their lands from depredations. Meanwhile, the Romans, among the variety of their other concerns, were not difregardful of the citadel of Tarentum, and the garrison besieged in it. direction of the fenate, Caius Servilius, lieutenant-general, was fent by Publius Cornelius, prætor, into Etruria, to purchase corn; with which having loaded several veffels, he passed through the guardships of the enemy, and arrived in the port of Tarentum. coming produced fuch a change in their disposition, that they who, a little before, when their hopes of relief were small, had frequently, in conferences, been solicited by the Carthaginian to defert the Roman cause, began now to solicit him to come over to them. The garrifon was abundantly strong, for the troops stationed at Metapontum had been brought hither for the defence of the citadel. The Metapontines being hereby freed from the restraint under which they had been held, inftantly revolted to Hannibal; as did the Thurians, on the same coast, induced, not only by the example of the Tarentines and Me- BOOK tapontines, with whom they were connected by confanguinity, being originally descended from natives of the same country of Achaia, but principally by B.C.212. refentment against the Romans, for the late execution of the hostages. The friends and relations of these sent letters and messages to Hanno and Mago, who were at no great distance in Bruttium, that if they brought their army near the walls, they would deliver the city into their hands. There was a finall garrison at Thurium commanded by Marcus Atinius, and they supposed that he might be easily tempted to engage rashly in a battle; not from any confidence in his own troops, (for they were very few,) but from relying on the support of the young men of the place, whom he had purpofely formed into companies and armed, that he might have them ready to aid him in exigencies of the kind. The Carthaginian commanders, dividing their forces, entered the territory of Thurium; and then Hanno, at the head of the infantry, in hostile array, advanced towards the city; while Mago, with the cavalry. halted under the cover of some hills, which stood conveniently for concealing the stratagem. nius learning nothing from his fcouts but march of the infantry, and ignorant both of the treachery within the city, and of the enemy's ambush, led out his forces to battle. The infantry engaged without any degree of vigour, the only exertions being made by the few Romans in front, the Thurians rather waiting for the issue, than taking any part in the action, while the Carthaginian line retreated on purpose to draw the incautious enemy to the back of the hill, where their horse was posted. No sooner did they arrive here, than the cavalry, rushing on with loud shouts, instantly put to flight the crowd of Thurians, who were almost ignorant of discipline, and not very faithfully attached to the party on whose side they appeared.

The

B.C. 212.

BOOK The Romans, notwithstanding their being surrounded, and hard preffed, by the infantry on one fide, and the cavalry on the other, maintained the fight Y.R.540. for a confiderable time: at last, they also turned their backs, and fled towards the city. Here the conspirators were collected together in a body, and received with open gates the multitude of their countrymen; but when they faw the routed Romans making towards them, they cried out, that the Carthaginians were close at hand, and if the gates were not speedily closed, the enemy, and all together, would pour in. In this manner they shut out the Romans, and left them to perish by the fword. Atinius, however, with a few others, gained admittance. A dispute now arose, and lasted for some time, one party maintained that thev ought to defend the city, another, that they ought to yield to fortune, and furrender it to the conquerors. But, as is too often the case, bad counsels prevailed. They conveyed Atinius, with a few attendants, to the ships near the shore, which they did out of personal regard to himself, and on account of the justice and mildness of his conduct in command, rather than out of goodwill to the Romans, and then opened their gates to the Carthaginians. The confuls led their legions from Beneventum into the territory of Campania, with the intention not only of destroying the corn, which was now in the blade, but of laying fiege to Capua; hoping to fignalize their confulate by the destruction of so opulent a city, and, at the same time, to free their government from the great shame of fuffering a revolt so near home to pass unpunished during the space of three years. But, that Beneventum should not be without a garrison, and that, in case of sudden emergencies, if Hannibal should come to (apua to fuccour his allies, as they had no doubt but he would, there might be a body of cavalry to oppose his, they ordered Tiberius Gracchus to come from Lucania to Beneventum, with his horse BOOK and light infantry, and to appoint some officer to XXV. command the legions in camp, in order to preferve peace in Lucania.

XVI. While Gracchus was performing facrifices, preparatory to his departure from Lucania, a prodigy of disastrous import occurred: when a victim was killed, two fnakes, creeping up from fome hiding-place to the entrails, eat the liver, and, after being feen by all prefent, fuddenly vanished. It is even faid, that when, by advice of the aruspices, the fame facrifice was repeated, and the pots containing the entrails were more carefully watched, the fnakes came a fecond, and a third time, and after eating the liver, went away unhurt. Though the diviners gave warning, that this portent concerned the general, and that he ought to be on his guard against secret enemies, and plots, yet his impending fate could not be averted by any effort of prudence. There was a Lucanian, called Flavius, the head of that division of his countrymen who adhered to the Romans when the other went over to Hannibal: and he was, in that year, in the chief magistracy, having been elected prætor by his party. This man changing his mind on a fudden, and feeking fome means of ingratiating himself with the Carthaginian, did not think it enough to draw his countrymen into a revolt, unless he ratified the league between him and the enemy with the head and blood of his commander, to whom he was also bound by ties of hospitality, and whom, notwithstanding, he determined to betray. He held a private conference with Mago, who commanded in Bruttium, and having received from him a solemn promise, that if he would deliver the Roman general into the hands of the Carthaginians, the Lucanians should be received into friendship, and retain their own laws

Y.R. 540. B.C. 212.

BOOK laws and their liberty, he conducted the Carthaginian to a fpot, whither, he faid, he would bring Gracchus with a few attendants. He then defired Mago to arm both horsemen and footmen, and to take poffession of that retired place, where a very large number might be concealed. After thoroughly examining the same on all fides, they appointed a day for the execution of the plan. Flavius then went to the Roman general, and told him, that " he had made fome progress in an " affair of great confequence, to the completion of "which the affistance of Gracehus himself was ne-" ceffary. That he had perfuaded all the prætors " of those states in Lucania, who, during the general " defection in Italy, had revolted to the Carthagi-" nians, to return into friendship with the Romans, " alleging that the power of Rome, which, by the "defeat at Cannæ, had been brought to the brink " of ruin, was every day improving and increasing, "while Hannibal's strength was declining, and had " funk almost to nothing. That, with regard to " their former transgression, the Romans would not 66 be implacable; for never was there a nation more " eafily appealed, and more ready to grant pardon; " and asking, how often had their own ancestors " received pardon of rebellion? These things," he faid. "he had represented to them; but that it would be more pleafing to them to hear the fame "from Gracchus himself; to be admitted into his. orefence, and to touch his right-hand, that they " might carry with them that pledge of faith. " had fixed a place," he faid, " for the parties to " meet, remote from observation, and at a small " distance from the Roman camp; there the busi--" ness might be finished in a few words, and the " alliance and obedience of the whole nation of " Lucania secured to the Romans." Gracchus, not perceiving, either in this discourse, or in the proposition itself, any reason to suspect perfidy, and being impofed imposed on by the plausibility of the tale, left the BOOK camp with his lictors and one troop of horse, and, XXV. following the guidance of his guest, fell precipitately Y.R. 540. into the snare. The enemy at once rose from their B.C. 212. ambush, and, what removed all doubt of treachery, Flavius joined himself to them. Weapons were now poured from all fides on Gracchus and his horsemen. He immediately leaped down from his horse, ordered the rest to do the same, and exhorted them, " as fortune had left them but one " part to act, to dignify that part by their bravery. "To a handful of men, furrounded by a multitude " in a valley hemmed in by woods and mountains, " what elfe was left than to die? The only alterna-" tive they had was, either tamely waiting their 66 blows, to be maffacred, like cattle, without the " pleasure of revenge, or with minds totally ab-" stracted from the thoughts of pain or of what the " iffue might be, and actuated folely by refentment " and rage, to exert every vigorous and daring " effort, and to fall covered with the blood of their " expiring foes." He defired that " all should aim " at the Lucanian traitor, and deferter;" adding, that "whoever should send that victim before him " to the infernal regions, would acquire distinguished "glory, and the greatest consolation for his own loss " of life." While he spoke thus, he wrapped his robe about his left arm, (for they had not even brought bucklers with them,) and then rushed on the murderers. The fight was maintained with greater vigour than could have been expected, confidering the smallness of their number. The Romans, whose bodies were uncovered and exposed, on all fides, to weapons thrown from the higher grounds into a deep valley, were mostly pierced through with javelins. Gracchus, being now left without fupport, the Carthaginians endeavoured to take him alive; but, observing his Lucanian guest among them, he rushed

Y R.540. B.C. 212.

BOOK rushed with such fury into the thickest of the band, that they could not feize him without the lofs of many lives. Mago immediately fent his body to Hannibal, defining that it should be laid, with the fasces taken at the same time, before the general's tribunal. This is the true account of the matter: Gracchus was cut off in Lucania, near the place called the Old Plains.

> XVII. Some lay the scene of this disaster in the territory of Beneventum, at the river Calor, where, they say, he went from the camp to bathe, attended by his lictors and three fervants; that he was flain by a party of the enemy, who happened to be lurking in the oziers which grew on the bank, while he was naked and unarmed, attempting, however, to defend himself with the stones brought down by the river. Others write, that, by direction of the aruspices, he went out half a mile from the camp, that he might expiate the prodigies before-mentioned in a place free from defilement, and that he was furrounded by two troops of Numidians, who were lying in wait there. So far are writers from agreeing with regard either to the place or the manner of the death of a man fo renowned and illustrious. are also various accounts of his funeral: some fay that he was buried by his own men in the Roman camp; others, whose account is more generally received, that a funeral pile was erected for him by Hannibal, at the entrance of the Carthaginian camp, and that the troops under arms marched in procession round it, with the dances of the Spaniards, and the feveral motions of their arms and bodies peculiar to each nation; while Hannibal himself joined in solemnizing his obsequies with every mark of respect, both in the terms in which he spoke of him, and in the manner of performing the rites. Such is the relation of those who state the affair as having happened in Lucania. If those BOOK are to be believed who affirm that he was killed at the river Calor, the enemy kept possession of Grac-chus's head only, which being brought to Hannibal, B.C. 212. he immediately sent Carthalo to convey it into the Roman camp to Cneius Cornelius, the quæstor; folemnizing the funeral of the general in his camp, in the performance of which the Beneventans joined with the foldiers.

XVIII. The confuls, having entered the Campanian territories, spread devastation on all sides, but were foon alarmed by the townsmen, in conjunction with Mago and his cavalry, marching hastily out against them. They called in the troops to their standards, from the several parts where they were dispersed; but, before they had completed the forming of their line of battle, they were put to the rout, and lost above fifteen hundred men. On this fuccess, that people, naturally disposed to arrogance, assumed the highest degree of considence, and endeavoured to provoke the Romans by frequent skirmishes: but the battle, into which they had been incautiously drawn, had rendered the confuls more circumfpect. However, the spirit of their party was revived, and the boldness of the other diminished, by an occurrence, in itself, of a trivial nature, but that, in war, scarcely any incident is fo infignificant, that it may not, on fome occasion, give cause to an event of much importance. A Campanian, called Badius, had been a guest of Titus Quintius Crispinus, and lived on terms of the closest friendship and hospitality with him, and their intimacy had increased in consequence of Crispinus having, in his own house at Rome, given very kind and affectionate attendance to Badius in a fit of fickness which he had there before the defection of Campania. This Badius, now, advancing in front of the guards posted before one of the gates, defired Y.R.540.

BOOK defired that Crispinus might be called: on being told of it, Crispinus, retaining a sense of private duties even after the diffolution of the public trea-B.C. 212. ties, imagined that his old acquaintance wished for an amicable interview, and went out to fome distance. As soon as they came within fight of each other, Badius cried out, " Crifpinus, I chal-" lenge you to combat: let us mount our horses, " and, making the rest keep back, determine which " of us is superior in arms." To which Crispinus answered, that "they were neither of them at a " loss for enemies, on whom they might display " their valour: that, for his part, should he even " meet him in the field of battle, he would turn " afide, to avoid imbruing his hands in the blood " of a guest;" he then attempted to go away. Whereupon, the Campanian, with greater passion, upbraided him as a coward; casting on him undeferved reproaches, which might with greater propriety have been applied to himself, at the same time charging him as being an enemy to the laws of hofpitality, and as pretending to be moved by concern for a person to whom he knew himself unequal; he faid, that " if not fufficiently convinced, that, by " the rupture of the public treaties, private obliga-" tions were at the fame time diffolved, Badius the "Campanian, now, in prefence of all, in the hearing of the two armies, renounced all connections of " hospitality with Titus Quintius Crispinus, the Ro-" man. He was under no bond of fociety with him; " an enemy had no claim of alliance on an enemy, " whose country, and whose tutelary deities, both " public and private, he had come to invade: if he " were a man, he would meet him." Crifpinus hefitated long, but, at last, the men of his troop perfuaded him not to fuffer the Campanian to infult him with impunity. Wherefore, waiting only to ask leave of the generals to fight, out of rule, with one who gave him a challenge, with their permission he took took arms, mounted his horse, and calling Badius BOOK by name, fummoned him to the combat. The Campanian made no delay, and they encountered in full career: Crispinus passing his spear over Badius's B.C. 212. buckler, ran it through his left shoulder, and, on his falling in confequence of the wound, difmounted in order to dispatch him as he lay, but Badius, to avoid impending death, left his horse and his buckler, and ran off to his own party. Crispinus seized the horse and arms, and with these glorious badges of victory, and with his bloody weapon held up to view, was conducted by the foldiers, amidd praifes and congratulations, to the confuls, from v hom he received ample commendations and honourable prefents.

XIX. Hannibal marched from the territory of Beneventum to Capua, and, on the third day after his arrival there, drew out his forces to face the enemy, confident that after the Campanians had a few days before, without his assistance, fought them with fuccess, the Romans would be much less able to withstand him and his army, which had so often defeated them. When the battle began, the Roman army was in danger of being worsted, in consequence, principally, of a charge made by the enemy's cavalry, who overwhelmed them with darts, until the fignal was given to their own cavalry to charge: and now the contest lay between the horse, when Sempronius's army, commanded by the quæstor Cneius Cornelius, being descried at a distance, gave an equal alarm, each party fearing that it was a reinforcement coming to his antagonist. The fignal of retreat was therefore given on both fides, as if by concert; and quitting the field on almost equal terms, they retired to their feveral camps: the Romans, however, had loft the greater number of men by the first onset of the horse. night

B.C. 212. cania.

BOOK night the confuls, in order to draw Hannibal from Capua, marched away by different routes, Fulvius Y.R.540. to the territory of Cumæ, Appius Claudius into Lu-On the day following, when Hannibal was informed that the Romans had forfaken their camp, and gone off in two divisions, by different roads, he hesitated at first, considering which of them he should purfue; and at length determined to follow Appius, who, after leading him about through whatever track he chose, returned by another road to Capua. Hannibal met, in that part of the country, an unlookedfor opportunity of striking an important blow: there was one Marcus Centenius, furnamed Penula, distinguished among the centurions of the first rank both by the fize of his body, and by his courage: this man, who had ferved his time in the army, being introduced to the fenate by the prætor, Publius Cornelius Sulla, requested of the fenators to grant him the command of five thousand men, assuring them, that "being thoroughly acquainted both with the " enemy and the country, he would fpeedily per-" form fomething that should give them satisfaction; " and that the fame wiles, by which hitherto the "Roman commanders used to be entrapped, he " would practife against the inventor of them." The folly of this propofal was equalled by the folly with which it was affented to; as if the qualifications of a centurion and a general were the same. Instead of five, eight thousand men were granted him, half citizens and half allies; besides these, he collected in his march through the country a confiderable number of volunteers; and, having almost doubled the number of his army, he arrived in Lucania, where Hannibal, after a vain pursuit of Appius, had halted. There was no room for doubt about the refult of a contest between such a captain as Hannibal, and a subaltern; in short, between armies, of which one was become veteran in a course of conquest, the other entirely new raised, for the most part undisciplined and but half armed. BOOK As foon as the parties came within view of each XXV. other, neither declining an engagement, the lines Y.R.540. were instantly formed. Notwithstanding the dispa- B.C. 212. rity of the forces, the battle was maintained in a manner unprecedented under fuch circumstances, the Roman foldiers, for more than two hours, making the most strenuous efforts, as long as their commander stood: but he, anxious to support his former reputation, and dreading moreover the difgrace which would afterwards fall on him if he survived a defeat occasioned by his own temerity, exposed himself rashly to the weapons of the enemy, and was slain; on which the Roman line immediately fell into confusion, and gave way. But even flight was now out of their power, for fo effectually had the enemy's cavalry shut up every pass, that, out of so great a multitude, scarcely a thousand made their escape; the rest, meeting destruction on every side, were all cut off in various ways.

XX. The confuls refumed the fiege of Capua with the utmost vigour, and took measures for procuring and collecting every thing requilite for carrying it on. A magazine of corn was formed at Cafilinum; a strong post was fortified at the mouth of the Vulturnus, where now stands a city; and a garrifon was put into Putcoli, formerly fortified by Fabius, Maximus, in order to fecure the command both of the river, and of the fea adjoining. The corn lately sent from Sardinia, and that which the prætor, Marcus Iunius, had bought up in Etruria, was conveyed from Ostia into these two maritime fortresses, to supply the army during the winter. Meanwhile, in addition to the misfortune sustained in Lucania, the army of volunteer flaves, who, during the life of Gracchus, had performed their duty with the ftrictest fidelity, supposing themselves at liberty by the death of their commander, forfook their standY.K.540.

BOOK ards, and disbanded. Hannibal, though not inclined to neglect Capua, or to abandon his allies at fuch a dangerous crifis, yet, having reaped fuch fignal ad-B.C. 212. vantage from the inconsiderate conduct of one Roman commander, was induced to turn his attention to an opportunity which offered of crushing another. Some deputies from Apulia informed him, that Cneius Fulvius, the prætor, had at first, while engaged in the fieges of feveral cities of that country, which had revolted to Hannibal, acted with care and circumspection; but that afterwards, in consequence of an overflow of fuccels, both himself and his men being glutted with booty, had fo entirely given themfelves up to licentiousness, that they neglected all military discipline. Wherefore, having on many other occasions, and particularly a few days before, learned from experience how little formidable an army was when under an unskilful commander, he marched away into Apulia.

> XXI. Fulvius and the Roman legions lay near Herdonia, where intelligence no fooner arrived that the enemy was approaching, than the troops were very near fnatching up their standards, and marching out to battle without the prætor's orders; and the fuffering themselves to be restrained was owing to the opinion entertained by them, that they might act as they chose. During the following night Hannibal, who had learned the disorder in their camp, and that most of them, calling the whole to arms, had prefumptuously insisted on their commander's giving the fignal, concluded with certainty, that he should now have an opportunity of fighting with advantage. He posted in the houses all around, and in the woods and thickets, three thoufand light-armed foldiers, who, on notice given, were fuddenly to quit their concealments; at the same time ordering Mago, with about two thousand horsemen, to secure all the passes on that side, to which

which he supposed the enemy would direct their BOOK flight. Having made these preparatory dispositions XXV. during the night, at the first dawn of day he led Y.R.540. out his forces to the field: nor did Fulvius decline B.C. 212. the challenge, though not fo much led by any hope conceived by himself, as forcibly drawn by the blind impetuolity of his men. The line was therefore formed with the same inconsiderate hurry with which they came out of the camp, just as the humour of the foldiers directed; for each, as he happened to come up, took whatever post he liked, and afterwards, either as whim or fear directed, forfook that post. The first legion, and the left wing, were drawn up in front, extending the line in length; and, notwithstanding the loud remonstrances of the tribunes, that it was not deep enough to have any strength or firmness, and that the enemy would break through wherever they attacked, fo far were they from paying attention, that they would not even liften to any wholesome advice. Hannibal now came up, a commander of a very different character, and with an army neither of a like kind, nor marshalled in like manner. Romans confequently withstood not their first attack. Their commander, in folly and rashness equal to Centenius, but far his inferior in spirit, as foon as he saw the matter going against him, and his men in confusion, hastily mounted his horse, and fled with about two hundred horsemen. The rest of the troops, vanguished in front, and furrounded on the flanks and rear, were put to the fword, in such a manner, that out of eighteen thousand men, not more than two thoufand escaped. The camp fell into the enemy's hands.

XXII. The news of these deseats, happening so quickly after one another, being brought to Rome, filled the minds of the public with much grief and x 3 conster-

BOOK consternation. However, as the confuls were hitherto fuccessful in their operations in the quarter Y.R.540. where the principal stress of the war lay, the alarm B.C. 212. occasioned by these misfortunes was the less. fenate dispatched Caius Lectorius and Marcus Metilius deputics to the confuls, with directions, that they should carefully collect the remains of the two armies, and use their endeavours to prevent them from furrendering to the enemy, through fear and despair, as had been the case after the deseat at Cannæ; and that they should make search for the deferters from the army of the volunteer flaves. The same charge was given to Publius Cornelius, who was also employed to raise recruits; and he caused proclamation to be made at all the fairs and markets, that the flaves in question should be fearched for, and brought back to their standards. All this was executed with the strictest care. Appius Claudius, the conful, after fixing Decius Junius in the command at the mouth of the Vulturnus, and Marcus Aurelius Cotta at Puteoli, with orders that when any ships should arrive from Etruria and Sardinia, to fend off the corn directly to the camp, went back himself to Capua, where he found his colleague Quintus Fulvius bufy in bringing in supplies of all kinds from Casilinum. and making every preparation for profecuting the fiege of Capua. They then joined in forming the fiege, and also sent for Claudius Nero, the prætor, from the Claudian camp at Suesfula; who, leaving behind a small garrison to keep possession of the pott, marched down with all the rest of his forces to Capua. Thus there were three prætorian pavilions erected round that city, and the three armies, commencing their operations in different quarters, proceeded to inclose it with a rampart and trench, erecting forts at moderate distances; so that when the Campanians attempted to obstruct their works, they fought them, in feveral places at once, with fuch themselves within their walls and gates. However, XXV. before these works were carried quite round, the Y.R.540. townsmen sent deputies to Hannibal, to complain B.C. 212. of his abandoning Capua, and delivering it, in a manner, into the hands of the Romans; and to beleech him, now at least, when they were not only invested, but even pent up, to bring them relief. The confuls received a letter from Publius Cornelius the prætor, that "before they completed the cir-" cumvallation of Capua, they should give leave to such of the Campanians as chose it, to retire "from the town, and carry away their effects with them. That as many as withdrew before 44 the Ides of March should enjoy their liberty " and their property entire: but that both those "who withdrew after that day, and those who " remained in the place, should be treated as ene-" mies." This notice was accordingly given to the Campanians, who received it with fuch fcorn, that they answered with reproaches, and even menaces. Hannibal had led his legions from Herdonia to Tarentum, in hopes that, either by force or stratagem, he might gain possession of the citadel of that town; but, being disappointed therein, he turned his route toward Brundusium, which he expected would be betrayed to him. While he was wasting time here, also, to no purpose, the deputies from Capua came to him, bringing at the same time their complaints, and intreaties for succour. To these Hannibal answered in an arrogant style, that he had before raifed the fiege of their town; and that the confuls would not now wait his coming. With this encouragement the deputies were difmissed, and with difficulty made their way back into the city, which was by this time furrounded fuch fuccess, that, at last, the besieged confined BOOK

XXIII. At

with a double trench and a rampart.

BOOK

XXIII. At the very time when the circumvallation of Capua was going on, the siege of Syracuse came to a conclusion, having been forwarded not Y.R. 540. only by the vigour and spirit of the besieging general and his army, but also by treachery within. For in the beginning of the spring, Marcellus had deliberated some time, whether he should turn his arms against Himilco and Hippocrates, who were at Agrigentum, or stay and press forward the siege of Syracuse, though he saw that the city could neither be reduced by force, as being from its fituation impregnable by land or fea, nor by famine, as supplies from Carthage had almost open access. Nevertheless, that he might leave no expedient untried, he had enjoined fome deferters from Syracuse, - many of whom of the highest rank were then in the Roman camp, having been banished when the defection from the Romans took place, on account of their disapprobation of the design of changing sides,—to confer with persons of their own way of thinking, to found the temper of the people, and to give them folemn affurances, that if the city were delivered into his hands, they should live free under their own There was no opportunity of conversing on the subject, because the great number of persons fuspected of disaffection had made every one attentive and vigilant to prevent any fuch attempt paffing unobserved. A fingle flave, belonging to some of the exiles, was fent as a deferter into the city, and he, communicating the business to a few, opened a way for a negotiation of the kind. After this, some few getting into a fishing boat, and concealing themfelves under the nets, were carried round in this manner to the Roman camp, where they held conferences with the deferters; and the same was done frequently, in the same manner, by several other parties: at last, the number amounted to eighty, and their plot was now ripe for execution, when a person called Attalus, offended that some part of the business had had been concealed from him, discovered their de- BOOK fign to Epicydes, and they were all put to death XXV. with torture. This project, thus rendered abortive, Y.R.540. was foon succeeded by another: one Damippus, a B.C. 212. Lacedæmonian, being fent from Syracuse to King Philip, had been taken prisoner by the Roman fleet; Epicydes earnestly wished to ransom him in particular, and from this Marcellus was not averse; for the Romans, even at that time, were defirous of procuring the friendship of the Ætolians, with which nation the Lacedæmonians were in alliance. persons were accordingly deputed to treat for his release, and the place judged the most central and convenient to both parties was at the Trogilian port, adjoining the tower called Galeagra. As they came several times to this spot, one of the Romans, having a near view of the wall, by reckoning the stones, and estimating, as far as he was able, the measure of each in the face of the work, conjectured nearly as to its height, and finding it confiderably lower than he or any of the rest had hitherto supposed, so that it might be scaled with ladders of even a moderate length, he represented the matter to Mar-The information was deemed not unworthy of attention, but as that fpot could not be openly approached, being, for the very reason mentioned, guarded with particular care, it was determined to watch for a favourable opportunity: this was foon found, through the means of a deferter, who brought intelligence that the befieged were celebrating the festival of Diana, which was to last three days; and as, in confequence of the fiege, most kinds of provisions were scarce, they indulged themselves in greater quantities of wine, which Epicydes supplied to the whole body of the plebeians, and which was distributed among the tribes by the people of distinction. Marcellus, on hearing this, communicated his defign to a few military tribunes; and having, by their means, felected centurions and

XXV. Y.R.540.

BOOK and foldiers properly qualified for an enterprise at once important and daring, he privately procured fcaling ladders, and ordered directions to be conveyed to the rest of the troops, that they should take their suppers early, and go to rest, because they were to be employed on an expedition in the night. Then, at the hour when he judged that the people, who had begun to feast early in the day, would be furfeited with wine, and begin to fleep, he ordered the men of one company to proceed with their ladders, while about a thousand men in arms were with filence conducted in a flender column to the fpot. The foremost having, without noise or tumult, mounted the wall, the rest followed in order, the boldness of the former giving courage even to the timorous.

> XXIV. This body of a thousand men had now gained possession of a part of the city, when the rest, bringing up greater numbers of ladders, scaled the wall; the first party having given them a fignal from the Hexapylos, to which they had penetrated without meeting a fingle person in the streets: for the greater part of the townsmen, having feasted together in the towers, were now either overpowered by wine, and funk in fleep, or, being half inebriated, still continued their debauch. A few of them, however, who were furprifed in their beds, were put to death. Vigorous efforts were then made to force open a postern gate near the Hexapylos, and, at the fame time, the fignal agreed on was returned from the wall by a trumpet. And now the attack was carried on in all quarters, not fecretly, but with open force; for they had reached the Epipolæ, where there were great numbers of the guards stationed, and it became requifite not to elude the notice of the enemy, but to terrify them; and terrified they were: for, as foon as the found of the trumpet was heard, and the shouts of the troops who had mastered

tered part of the city, the guards thought that the BOOK whole was taken, and some of them fled along the XXV. wall, others leaped down from the ramparts, and Y.R.540. crowds, flying in difmay, were tumbled headlong. B.C. 212. A great part of the townsmen, however, were still ignorant of the misfortune which had befallen them, being all of them overpowered with wine and fleep; and in a city of fuch vast extent, what happened in any one quarter, could not be very readily known in all the rest. A little before day, a gate of the Hexapylos being forced, Marcellus, with all his troops, This roused the townsmen, who entered the city. betook themselves to arms, endeavouring, if possible, to preserve the place. Epicydes hastily led out some troops from the island called Nasos, not doubting but he should be able to drive out what he conjectured to be a finall party, and which he supposed had found entrance through the negligence of the guards. telling the affrighted fugitives whom he met, that they were adding to the tumult, and that they reprefented matters greater and more terrible than they But when he saw every place round the Epipolæ filled with armed men, he waited only to discharge a few missive weapons, and marched back into the Achradina, dreading not fo much the number and strength of the enemy, as that some treachery might, on fuch an opportunity, take place within, and that he might find the gates of the Achradina and the island shut against him. When Marcellus entered the gate, and had from the high grounds a full view of the city, the most beautiful perhaps of any in those times, he is faid to have shed tears, partly out of joy at having accomplished an enterprise of such importance, and partly from the fenfations excited by reflecting on the high degree of renown which the place had enjoyed through a long feries of years. Memory represented to him the Athenian fleets funk there; two vast armies cut off with two generals of the highest reputation; the BOOK the many wars maintained against the Carthaginians Y.R. 540. all remembered very lately reionially Hiero, whom B.C. 212. all remembered very lately reigning, and who, be-fides all the distinctions which his own merit and good fortune conferred on him, was highly remarkable for his zealous friendship to the Roman people: when all these reflections occurred to his mind, and were followed by the confideration, that every object then under his view would quickly be in flames, and reduced to ashes, - thus reflecting, before he advanced to attack the Achradina, he fent forward some Syracusans, who, as has been mentioned, were within the Roman quarters, to try if they could, by mild persua-sions, prevail on the Syracusans to surrender the town.

> XXV. The fortifications of the Achradina were occupied by deferters, who could have no hope of a pardon in case of a capitulation: these, therefore, would not fuffer the others to come nigh the walls, nor to hold conversation with any one. Marcellus, finding that no opportunity could offer of effecting any thing by persuasion, ordered his troops to move back to the Euryalus. This is an eminence at the verge of the city, on the fide most remote from the fea, commanding the road which leads into the country and the interior parts of the island, and therefore very commodiously situate for securing admittance to convoys of provisions. The commander of this fortress was Philodemus, an Argive, stationed here by Epicydes. To him Sosis, one of the regicides, was fent by Marcellus with certain proposi-tions; who, after a long conversation, being put off with evafions, brought back an account that the Argive required time for deliberation. ferred giving any positive answer from day to day, in expectation that Hippocrates and Himilco, with their their legions, would come up; and he doubted not BOOK that if he could once receive them into the fortress, the Roman army, hemmed in as it was within walls, Y.R.540. might be effectually cut off. Marcellus, therefore, B.C. 212. feeing no probability of the Euryalus being either furrendered or taken, encamped between Neapolis and Tycha, parts of the city fo named, and in themselves equal to cities; for he feared, lest, if he went into the more populous parts, the greedy foldiers might not, by any means, be restrained from pillaging. Hither came deputies from the Neapolis and the Tycha, with fillets and other badges of supplicants, praying him to spare the lives of the inhabitants, and to refrain from burning their houses. the subject of these petitions, offered in the form of prayers rather than of demands, Marcellus held a council; and, according to the unanimous determination of all present, published orders to the soldiers, to "offer no violence to any person of free condi-"tion, but that they might feize every thing else as " fpoil." The walls of the houses surrounding his camp ferved it as a fortification, and, at the gates facing the wide streets, he posted guards and detachments of troops, to prevent any attack on it while the foldiers should be in fearch of plunder. On a fignal given, the men dispersed themselves for that purpose; and, though they broke open doors, and filled every place with terror and tumult, yet they refrained from bloodshed, but put no stop to their ravages, until they had removed all the valuable effects which had been amassed there in a long Meanwhile Philocourse of prosperous fortune. demus, feeing no prospect of relief, and receiving asfurances that he might return to Epicydes in fafety, withdrew the garrison, and delivered up the fortress to the Romans. While the attention of all was turned to the commotion in that part of the city which was taken, Bomilcar, taking advantage of a stormy night, when the violence of the weather would not allow

BOOK the Roman fleet to ride at anchor in the deep, Y.R.540. flipped out of the harbour of Syracuse with thirty-five ships, and, finding the sea open, sailed forth B.C.212. After informing the Carthaginians of the perilous state of affairs in Syracuse, he returned thither, in a few days, with an hundred ships, when he received, as is said, many valuable presents from Epicydes out of the treasure of Hiero.

> XXVI. Marcellus, by gaining possession of the Euryalus, and putting a garrison into it, was freed from one cause of anxiety; for he had apprehended that a body of the enemy's forces might get into that fortress on his rear, and thence annoy his troops, pent up, as they were, and entangled among walls. He then invested the Achradina, forming three camps in proper fituations, in hopes, by a close blockade, of reducing it by a want of necessaries. The out-guards, on both fides, had been quiet for feveral days, when Hippocrates and Himilco fuddenly arrived; and the confequence was an attack on the Romans in different quarters at once. Hippocrates, having fortified a camp at the great harbour, and given a fignal to the garrison in the Achradina, fell on the old camp of the Romans, where Crifpinus commanded; and, at the fame time, Epicydes fallied out against the posts of Marcellus, while the Carthaginian fleet warped in close to the shore, which lay between the city and the Roman flation, in order to prevent any fuccour being fent by Marcellus to Crifpinus. Their attacks, however, caused more alarm than real injury; for Crispinus, on his part, not only repulfed Hippocrates from his works, but made him fly with precipitation, and pursued him to some distance: and, in the other quarter, Marcellus beat back Epicydes into the town. It was even supposed that enough was now done done to prevent any danger in future, from their BOOK making fudden fallies. To other evils attendant on the siege, was added a pestilence; a calamity felt Y.R. 540. by both parties, and fully sufficient to divert their B.C. 212. thoughts from plans of military operations. It was now autumn; the places, where they lay, were in their nature unwholesome, but much more so on the outfide of the city than within; and the heat was fo intense, as to impair the health of almost every perfon in both the camps. At first, the insalubrity of the feafon and the foil produced both ficknesses and deaths: afterwards, the attendance on the difeased, and the handling of them, spread the contagion wide; infomuch, that all who were feized by it either died neglected and forfaken, or, also infecting fuch as ventured to take care of them, thefe were carried off also. Scarcely any thing was seen but funerals; and, both day and night, lamentations from every fide rang in their cars. At last, habituated to these scenes of woe, they contracted such favageness, that, so far from attending the deceased with tears and forrowings, they would not even carry them out and inter them, so that they lay scattered over the ground in the view of all, and who were in constant expectation of a fimilar fate. dead contributed to the destruction of the sick, and the fick to that of the healthy, both by the apprehensions which they excited, and by the contagion and noisome stench of their bodies; while some, wishing rather to die by the sword, singly assailed the enemy's posts. But the distemper raged with much greater fury in the Carthaginian camp than in that of the Romans: for the latter, by lying fo long before Syracule, were become more hardened against the air and the rains. Of the enemy's troops, the Sicilians, as foon as they faw that the spreading of the distemper was owing to an unhealthy situation, left it, and retired to the feveral cities in the neighbourhood, which were of their party: but the Cartha-

BOOK Carthaginians, who had no place of retreat, perished (together with their commanders, Hippocrates and Himilco,) to a man. Marcellus, when he perceived Y.R. 540. R. rumico,) to a man. Marcellus, when he perceived B.C. 212. the violence of the diforder increasing, had removed his troops into the city, where, being comfortably lodged, and sheltered from the inclemency of the air, their impaired constitutions were soon restored: nevertheless great numbers of the Roman soldiers were fwept away by this pestilence.

> XXVII. The land forces of the Carthaginians being thus entirely destroyed, the Sicilians, who had ferved under Hippocrates, collected from their feveral states stores of provisions, which they depofited in two towns, of no great fize, but well fecured by strong situations and fortifications; one three miles distant from Syracuse, the other five; and, at the fame time, they folicited fuccours. Meanwhile Bomilcar, going back again to Carthage with his fleet, gave such a representation of the condition of the allies, as afforded hopes that it might be practicable, not only to fuccour them in fuch a manner as would ensure their safety, but also to make prisoners of the Romans in the very city which they had, in a manner, reduced; and by this means he prevailed on the government to fend with him as many transport vessels as could be procured, laden with stores of every kind, and to make an addition to his own fleet. Accordingly he fet fail with an hundred and thirty ships of war, and feven hundred transports, and met with a wind very favourable for his paffage to Sicily, but the fame wind prevented his doubling Cape Pachynum. The news of Bomilcar's arrival first, and afterwards his unexpected delay, gave joy and grief alternately both to the Romans and Syracusans. But Épicydes, dreading lest, if the same easterly wind which then prevailed should continue to blow for some days longer, the Carthaginian fleet fleet might fail back to Africa, delivered the com- BOOK mand of the Achradina to the generals of the mercenaries, and failed away to Bomilcar. Him he Y.R. 5405 found lying to, with the heads of his vessels turned B.C. 21324 towards Africa, being fearful of an engagement with the enemy, not on account of any superiority in their strength or number of ships (for his own was the greater), but because the wind was the more advantageous to the Roman fleet. With difficulty, then. he prevailed on him to confent to try the iffue of a naval engagement. On the other fide, Marcellus, feeing that an army of Sicilians was affembling from all quarters of the island, and that the Carthaginian fleet was approaching with abundance of supplies, began to fear, left, if he should be shut up in an holtile city, and that every passage being barred both by land and sea, he should be reduced to great distrels. Although unequal to the enemy in number of fhips, he yet determined to oppose Bomilcar's passage to Syracuse. The two hostile fleets lay off the promontory of Pachynum, ready to engage as foon as moderate weather should allow them to fail out into the main. On the subsiding of the easterly wind, which had blown furiously for feveral days, Bomilcar first put his fleet in motion, and his van feemed to make out to fea with intent to clear the cape; but, when he faw the Roman bearing down on him, and being fuddenly alarmed, from what circumstance is not known, he bore away to sea, and fending messengers to Heraclea, ordering the transports to return to Africa, he failed along the coast of Sicily to Tarentum. Epicydes, thus disappointed in a measure from which he had conceived very fanguine hopes, and unwilling to go back into the belieged city, whereof a great part was already in possession of the enemy, failed to Agrigentum, where he proposed rather to wait the issue of affairs than to attempt any new enterprise.

BOOK XXV. fo Y.R.540.

XXVIII. When the Sicilians in camp were informed of all these events, (that Epicydes had withdrawn from Syracuse, that the Carthaginians had abandoned the island, and, in a manner, furrendered it a fecond time to the Romans,) they demanded a conference with those who were shut up in the town, and learning their inclinations, they fent deputies to Marcellus, to treat about terms of capitulation. There was fcarcely any debate about the conditions, which were, — that whatever parts of the country had been under the dominion of the kings should be ceded to the Romans; and the rest, together with independence, and their own laws, should be guaranteed to the Sicilians. the deputies invited the persons entrusted with the command by Epicydes to a meeting, and told them, that they had been fent by the Sicilian army to them as well as to Marcellus, in order that those within the city, as well as those without, should all share one fortune, and that neither should stipulate any article, feparately, for themselves. From thefe they obtained permission to enter the place, and converse with their relations and friends, to whom they recited the terms which they had already adjusted with Marcellus; and, by the prospect of fafety which they held out to their view, prevailed on them to unite in an attack on Epicydes's generals, Polyclitus, Philiftio, and Epicydes, furnamed Syndos. These they put to death, and then calling the multitude to an affembly, and lamenting the famine they had undergone, infifted, that "notwithstanding they " were pressed by so many calamities, yet they had " no reason to complain of Fortune, because it was " in their own power to determine how long they "would endure their fufferings. The reason which "induced the Romans to besiege Syracuse was, " affection to its inhabitants, not enmity. For " when they heard that the government was feized on by the partizans of Hannibal, and afterwards by those of Hieronymus, Hippocrates, and Epi- BOOK "cydes, they then took arms, and laid fiege to XXV.

"the city, with the purpose of subduing, not the Y.R. 140. " city itself, but those who cruelly tyrannised over ac. 218. 66 it. But after Hippocrates had been carried off, 66 Epicydes excluded from Syracufe, his generals " put to death, and the Carthaginians expelled, and unable to maintain any kind of footing in 66 Sicily, either by fleets or armies, what reason could the Romans then have for not wishing the " fafety of Syracuse, as much as if Hiero himself, 6 fingularly attached to the Roman interest, were still alive? Neither the city, therefore, so nor the inhabitants stood in any other danger 44 than what they might bring on themselves, by 44 neglecting an opportunity of reconciliation with 66 the Romans: but fuch another opportunity they e never could have, as that which prefented it-66 felf at that inflant, on its being once known sthat they were delivered from their infolent ty-" rants."

XXIX. This discourse was listened to with univerfal approbation; but it was refolved that, before any deputies should be appointed, prætors should be elected: and then fome of the prætors themselves were lant deputies to Malcellus. person at the head of the commission addressed him to this effect: "Neither was the revolt, at the besinning, the act of us Syraculans, but of Iliero-" nymus, whose conduct toward, you was not near 66 fo wicked as his treatment of us; nor, afterwards, was it any Syracufan, but Hippocrates and I pi-"cydes, two instruments of the late king, who, while we were distracted between fear on one 44 fide and treachery on the other, broke through the peace established on the death of the tyrant; or can any period be named, in which we were at liberty, and were not at the fame time in friend-Y 2

BOOK " ship with you. At present it is manifest, that as " foon as ever, by the death of those who held " Syracuse in bondage, we became our own mas-Y.R.540. " ters, we have come, without a moment's hesita-B.C.212. "tels, we have come, many to furrender our-" felves, our city, and fortifications, and to refuse " no conditions which you shall think fit to im-" pose. Marcellus, the gods have given you the "glory of taking the most renowned and most "beautiful of all the Grecian cities; whatever " memorable exploits we have at any time per-" formed, either on land or fea, all will go to " augment the splendour of your triumph. Let " it not be your wish, that men shall learn, from " tradition, how great a city you have reduced, " but rather, that the city itself may stand a mo-" nument to posterity, exhibiting to the view of " every one who shall approach it, by land or by " fea, our trophies over the Athenians and Cartha-"ginians; then, your's over us; and that you may " transmit Syracuse, unimpaired, to your family, " to be kept under the patronage and guardianship of the race of the Marcelli. Let not the memory 66 of Hieronymus weigh more with you, than that " of Hiero. The latter was much longer your " friend, than the former your enemy; and, be-" fides, you have felt many effects of the kindness " of the one, while the other's madness tended " only to his own ruin." From the Romans all their requests were easily obtained, and their safety ran no hazard from that quarter: there was more danger from an hostile disposition among themfelves; for the deferters, apprehending that they were to be delivered up to the Romans, brought the auxiliary troops of mercenaries to entertain the fame fears. Hastily taking arms, they first sew the practors; then fpreading themselves over the city, put to death in their rage every person whom chance threw in their way, pillaging every thing on which they could lay hands. Afterwards, that BOOK. they might not be without leaders, they created fix præfects, three to command in the Achradina, and Y.R.540 three in the island. The tumult at length subsiding, B.C. 212. the mercenaries discovered, on inquiry, the purport of the articles concluded on with Marcellus, and then began to fee clearly, what was really the cafe, that their fituation was widely different from that Very feafonably the deputies of the deferters. returned at this time from Marcellus, and affured them, that the fuspicion which had provoked their fury was groundless, and that the Ron ins had no kind of reason to demand their punishment.

XXX. One of the three commanders in the Achradina was a Spaniard, by name Mericus. found him, a Spanish auxiliary in the camp of the Romans was purposely sent in the train of the deputies; who, taking an opportunity when he found Mericus alone, first informed him in what state he had left the affairs of Spain, from whence he had lately come; that "every thing there was "under subjection to the Roman arms;" and added, "that it was in his power, by some service " of importance, to become distinguished among "his countrymen; whether it were that he chose " to accept a commission in the Roman army, or 66 to return to his native country. On the other " hand, if he perfifted in attempting to hold out "the fiege, what hope could he entertain, when " he was fo closely invested both by sea and land?" Mericus was fo much affected by these arguments, that, when it was determined to fend deputies to Marcellus, he appointed, as one of them, his own brother, who being conducted by the fame Spaniard to a fecret interview with Marcellus, and having received fatisfactory affurances from him, and con-. certed the method of conducting the business they had planned, returned to the Achradina. Then Mericus.

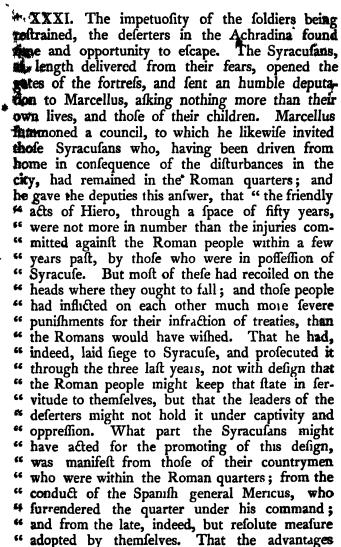

THE HISTORY

MONE EL-40.

K Maricus, with design to prevent all suspicion treachery, declared, that "he did not approve "deputies thus going backwards and forwards. "that none fuch ought to be received or fent; " and, that the guard might be kept with the strice. care, the proper posts ought to be divided among " the præfects, so that each should be answer " for the safety of his own quarter." Every approved of this division of the posts; and the tract which fell to his own lot, was that from fountain Arcthusa, to the mouth of the great have bour: of this he apprifed the Romans. Marchine therefore gave orders, that a transport ship, full and foldiers, should be towed in the night, by the barge of a quadrineme, to the Achradina; and that they should be landed opposite to the gate which is near the faid fountain. This being executed at the fourth watch, and Mericus having, according to concert, admitted the foldiers into the gate, Marcellus, at the first light, assaulted the walls of the Achradina with . all his lovces, by which means he not only engaged the attention of those who guarded it, but caused feveral battalions to flock thither from the island. quitting their own posts to repel the furious assault of the Romans. While this alarm was at the height, ionic light gallies, prepared beforehand, failed round, and landed a body of troops on the island; and these, making an unexpected attack on the halfmanned posts, and the open gate, without much difficulty made themselves masters of the island; for it was abandoned to them by the garrison, who fled in consternation. The deserters maintained their ground with no more steadiness than these: for, being diffident in some degree even of each other, they betook themselves to flight during the heat of the conflict. When Marcellus learned that the island was taken, that one quarter of "the Achradina was in possession of his troops, and that Mericus had joined them with the party under royal treasure, which fame represented thach larger than it was, should be rifled by the soldiers.

OF ROME.

Y 4

" accruing

327 2005 Y.E.M.

THE HISTORY

OK " accruing to him, from all the toils and dang " by fea and land, which he had undergone through " fuch a length of time under the Syracusan walls. " were by no means equal to what Syracuse might "have procured to itself." The quæstor was the fent with a guard to the island, to receive and secure the royal treasure; and the city was given up to troops to be plundered, centinels being first place at the feveral houses of those who had staid in the Roman quarters. While numberless horrid acts of rage and of avarice were perpetrated, it is related that, in the violence of the tumult, which was as great as greedy foldiers ever caused in facking a captured city, Archimedes, while intent on some geometrical figures which he had drawn in the fand. was flain by a foldier, who knew not who he was; that Marcellus lamented his death, and gave him an honourable funeral; and that inquiry was also made for his relations, to whom his name and memory proved a protection and an honour. In this manner nearly, was Syracuse taken, and in it such a quantity of booty, as Carthage, which waged an equal contest with Rome, would scarcely have afforded at that time. A few days before the conquest of Syracuse, Titus Otacilius, with eighty quinqueremes, failed over from Lilybæum to Utica, and, entering the harbour before day, feized a number of transports laden with corn; he then landed his troops, ravaged a great part of the country round the city, and brought back to his fleet much booty of all kinds. On the third day from his departure, he returned to Lilybæum, with an hundred and thirty vessels filled with corn and spoil. He fent off their cargoes immediately to Syracuse, where, if this supply had not arrived so seasonably, both the conquerors and the vanguished were threatened alike with a destructive famine.

OF ROME.

XXXII. As to the affairs of Spain, near two Boy had passed without any thing very material being done, and the business of the war consisted mer in scheming than in acting; but now, the no Roman generals, quitting their winter-quarters, united their forces, and a council being held, all conred in opinion that, fince their fole object had hitherto been to detain Hasdrubal from the pro-Acution of his intended march into Italy, it was time to think of an end to the war in Spain; and they trusted that their strength was rendered adequate to the undertaking, by the addition of thirty thousand Celtiberians, whom they had, during the preceding winter, engaged to join their arms. There were three armies of the enemy: one under Haldrubal, fon of Gifgo, and another under Mago, were encamped together at the distance of about five days march. The third lay nearer, and was commanded by Hasdrubal, son of Hamilcar, the oldest general in Spain, who was posted near a city named Anitorgis. Him the Roman generals wished to overpower first, and they were confident that their strength was abundantly sufficient to effect it: their only concern was, left Hasdrubal and Mago, dispirited by his retreat, might retire into the inaccessible forests and mountains. and thus protract the war. They therefore concluded, that it would be most advisable by separating their forces, to extend the compals of their operations, fo as to comprehend the whole war at once. Accordingly, they divided them in such a manner, that Publius Cornelius was to lead twothirds of the Romans and allies against Mago and Hasdrubal; and Cneius Cornelius, with the other third of the veteran troops, and the Celtiberian auxiliaries, was to act against the Barcine Hasdrubal. The commanders began their march together, the Celtiberians advancing before them, and pitched their camp near the city of Anitorgis, within

THE HISTORY

K view of the enemy, from whom they were feet rated by a river. There Cneius Scipio, with the forces before-mentioned, halted, and Publius Scipio proceeded, according to his allotment, to the science of action.

> XXXIII. When Hesdrubal observed that the were but few Roman foldiers in the camp, and 'that all their dependance was on the Celtiberian auxiliaries, being well acquainted with the perfedious disposition of every barbarous nation, and particularly of theie, among whom he had waged war for so many years, he contrived secret conferences with their leaders; for as both camps were full of Spaniards, an intercourse was and with whom he concluded a bargain, that, for a valuable confideration, they should carry away their troops. Nor did this appear to them a. heinous crime: for it was not required that they should turn their arms against the Romans, and the hire given for not fighting was as great as could be expected for fighting; befides, reft from fatigue, the returning to their homes, and the pleasure of sceing their friends and families, all these were matters highly agreeable to them, fo that the chiefs were not more eafily perfuaded than were their followers. It was farther confidered, that they need not fear the Romans, whose number was small, even if they should attempt to detain them by force. It will ever, indeed, be incumbent on Roman generals to avoid carefully fuch kind of mistakes, and to consider instances like this as powerful warnings, never to confide fo far in foreign auxiliaries, as not to keep in their camps a superior force of their native troops, and of their own proper strength. The Celtiberians, on a fudden, took up their standards and marched off, giving no other answer to the Romans (who belought them to stay), than that they were called

OF ROME.

when Scipio faw that it be impossible to detain the auxiliaries either by intreaties or force; that, without them, he was unable either to cope with the enemy, or effect a reunion with his brother; and that there was no other resource at hand, from which he could hope for sectource at hand, from which he could have sectource at hand, from he could hope for sectource at hand, from he could have sectource at hand

XXXIV. At the fame time Publius Scipio was furrounded with equal fears, and greater danger, occasioned by a new enemy: this was young Masipidla, at that time an ally of the Carthaginians, afterwards rendered illustrious and powerful by the friendship of the Romans. He, with his Numidian savalry, met Publius Scipio as he approached, haraffing him incessantly night and day. Not only were stragglers, who went to a distance from the camp for wood and forage, intercepted by him, but he would even nide up to the very entrenchments; and often, charging into the midit of the advance guards, fill every quarter with the utmost confufion. In the night-time also, by sudden attacks, he frequently caused terror and alarm at the gates, and on the rampart; nor did any place, or any time, afford the Romans respite from fear and anxiety, confined as they were within their trenches, and debarred from procuring every kind of necessary, fuffering almost a regular blockade; and which they knew would be still more close, if Indibilis, who was faid to be approaching, with feven thousand five hundred Sueffetanians, should join the Carthaginians. Impelled by the inextricable difficulties of his fituation, Scipio, heretofore a commander of known caution and prudence, adopted the rash resolution

332

BOOK folution of going out by night to meet Indibilis. to fight him. Accordingly, leaving a small grand, in the camp, under the command of Titus Fonteius, lieutenant general, he marched out at midnight, and, falling in with the enemy, began an engagement. The troops encountered each other in the order of march rather than of battle; however, irregular as the manner of fighting was, the Romans had the advantage. But on a sudden the Numidian cavalry, whose observation the general thought he had escaped, falling on his flanks, struck great terror into the troops, and, while they had this new contest to maintain, a third enemy fell upon them, the Carthaginian generals coming up with their rear during the heat of the battle. Thus the Romans affailed on every fide, unable to judge against which enemy they might best direct their united strength. in order to force a passage. While their commander fought, and encouraged his men, exposing him felf to every danger, he was run through the right fide with a lance. The party who made the attack on the band collected about the general, when they faw Scipio fall lifeless from his horse, being elated with joy, ran shouting up and down through the whole line, crying out, that the Roman commander was killed, which words clearly determined the battle in favour of the enemy. The latter, immediately on losing their general, began to fly from the field; but though they might have found no great difficulty in forcing their way through the Numidians, and the other light-armed auxiliaries, yet it was scarcely possible that they should escape from fuch a multitude of cavalry, and of footmen who were nearly equal to the horses in speed. Accordingly, almost as many fell in the flight as in the battle, nor probably would one have furvived, had not the night stopped the pursuit, it being by this time late in the evening.

XXXV. The

XXXV. The Carthaginian generals were not BOOK remissin making advantage of their good fortune: without losing time after the battle, and scarcely altowing the foldiers necessary rest, they marched B.C. 212 away, with rapid hafte, to Hafdrubal, fon of Hamilear, confidently affured, that after uniting their forces with his, they should be able to bring the war to a speedy conclusion. On their arrival at his camp, the warmest congratulations passed between the commanders and the armies, overjoyed at their late fuccesses, in which so great a general, with his whole army, had been cut off; and they expected, as a matter of certainty, another victory equally important. Not even a rumour of this great milfortune had yet reached the Romans; but there prevalled among them a melancholy kind of filence, and a tacit foreboding; fuch a prelage of impending evil as the mind is apt to feel when looking forward with anxiety. Cornelius, after the defertion of the auxiliaries, had nothing to dispirit him except the angmentation which he observed in the enemy's force, yet was he led by conjectures and reasoning, rather to entertain a suspicion of some disaster, than any favourable hopes. "For how," faid he, "could "Hafdrubal and Mago, unless decisively victorious " in their own province, bring hither their army "without opposition? And how could it happen, "that Publius had neither opposed their march, " nor followed on their rear, in order that, if he " found it impracticable to prevent the junction of "the enemy's armies, he might, in any case, unite " his forces with those of his brother." tracted with these perplexing thoughts, he could fee no other means of fafety at present, than by retreating as fast as possible. Accordingly, in the night, and while the enemy, ignorant of his departure, remained quiet, he performed a march of considerable length. On the return of day, the enemy, perceiving that his army had decamped, fent

THE HISTORY

BOOK sent forward the Numidians, and set out de the XXV. pursuit with all the expedition in their power. "Before night, the Numidians overtook them, and have Y.R. 540. raffed them with attacks, fometimes on the flates, B.C. 212. fometimes on the rear. They then began to halt, and defend themselves: but Scipio earnestly exhorted them to fight and advance at the fame time, lest the enemy's infantry should overtake them.

> XXXVI. But as by this method of advancing at one time, and halting at another, they made but little progress on their way, and as the hight now approached, Scipio called in his men, and collecting them in a body, drew them off rifing ground, not very fafe indeed, especially for dispirited troops, yet higher than any of the forrounding grounds. Here the infantry, receiving the baggage and the cavalry into the centre, and forming a circle round them, at first repelled. without difficulty, the attacks of the Numician skirmishers. Afterwards, the three regular armie of the enemy approached with their entire force; when the general faw that without some fortification his men would never be able to maintain their post; he therefore began to look about, and confider whether he could by any means raise a rampart round it. But the hill was fo bare, and the furface fo rocky, that not fo much as a bush was to be found which could be cut for palifadoes, nor earth with which to raife a mound, nor any means of forming a trench, or any other work; nor was any part of it fuch as to render it of difficult approach or afcent, every fide rifing with a gentle acclivity. However, that they might place in the way of the enemy some resemblance of a rampart, they tied the panniers together, and building them as it were on one another, formed a mound about their post, throwing on bundles of every kind of baggage

3

there was a deficiency of panniers for raising BOY it. When the Carthaginian armies came to the XXX place, they mounted the hill with perfect ease, but Y.R 54 were at first so surprised at this strange appearance B.C. 1212. of a fortification, that they halted, notwithstanding their officers every where called out, and asked them, "why did they stop, and not tear down and scatter 46. about that ridiculous work, fcarcely strong enough "to ftop women or children;" adding, that "they now had the enemy that up as prisoners, and " hiding themselves behind their baggage." Such were their contemptuous reproofs; but it was no easy matter either to climb over, or to rerange, the bulky loads which lay in the way, or through the panniers fo closely compacted and buried under heaps of baggage. The packages which obstructed them were at length removed, and a passage opened to the troops; and the same being done in feveral parts, the camp was forced of all fides, while the Romans, inferior in number, dejected by misfortunes, were every where to the fword by the more numerous enemy, elated with victory. However, a great number of the foldiers fled into the woods which lay at a fmall distance behind, and thence made their escape to the camp of Publius Scipio, where Titus Fontelus, his lieutenant-general, commanded. Cneius Scipio, according to fome accounts, was killed on the hill, in the first assault; according to others, he fled into a castle standing near the camp; this was furrounded with fire, and the doors, which were too strong to be forced, being thus burned, they where taken; and all within, together with the general himself, were put to death. Cneius Scipio perished in the feventh year after his coming into Spain, the twenty-ninth day after the fall of his brother. Their deaths caused not greater grief at Rome, than in every part of Spain. Nay, among their countrymen, the loss of the armies, the alienation

BOOK tion of the province, the misfortune of the public. challenged a share of their forrow; whereas Spain lamented and mourned for the commanders them-B.C. 212 felves, and for Cneius even more than for his beather, because he had been longer in the government of their country, had earlier engaged their affections. and was the first who gave them a specimen of the Roman justice and moderation.

> XXXVII. The army was now supposed to be utterly ruined, and Spain to be entirely loft, when one man retrieved the Roman affairs from this defperate condition: this was Lucius Marcius, fon of Septimus, a Roman knight, a young man of an enterprifing temper, and of a capacity which would do chait to a rank much superior to that in which he was been These very great talents had been improved by the discipline of Cneius Scipio, under which he had, in a course of many years, acquired a thorough know. ledge of all the arts of war. Collecting the foldiers. after their dispersion in the flight, and drafting others out of the garrisons, he formed an army far from contemptible, with which he joined Titus Fonteins. the lieutenant-general of Publius Scipio. a fuperior ascendancy was possessed, by a Roman knight in the respect and esteem of the soldiery. that, after fortifying a camp on the hither fide of the Iberus, they determined that a commander should be chosen for the two armies by fuffrages of the foldiers. On this, relieving other fuccessively in the guard of the rampart and other posts, until every one had given his vote, they all concurred in conferring the chief command Lucius Marcius. The remaining time of their there, which was but short, was employed strengthening the camp, and collecting provisions the foldiers executing every order not only with ger e but with cut betraying any dejection whatever. But when intelligence was brought that Haldrubal, for of Gifgo, was coming to crush the last remains BOO of seposition; that he had passed the Iberus, and was drawing near; and when they faw the fignal of Y.R. 5400 battle displayed by a new commander—then, recol- B.C. 212 lecting what captains and what forces had used to support their confidence when going out to fight, they all on a sudden burst into tears, and beat their Some raifed their hands towards heaven, taxing the gods with cruelty; others, prostrate on the ground, invoked by name each his own former commander: nor could their lamentations be restrained by all the efforts of the centurions, or by the foothings and expostulations of Marcius himself. who asked them, "why they abandoned themselves womanly and unavailing tears, and did not 464 rather summon up their siercest courage, for the common defence of themselves and the commonwealth, and for avenging their flaughtered gene-" rals?" Meanwhile, on a fudden, the shout and the found of trumpets were heard, for the enemy were by this time near the rampart; and now their grief being instantly converted into rage, they hastily inatched up their arms, and, as if instigated by madnefs, ran to the gates, and made a furious attack on the forces, who were advancing in a careless and irregular manner. This unexpected reception immediately struck the Carthaginians with dismay: they wondered whence fuch a number of enemies could have started up, since the almost total extinction of their force; whence the vanquished and routed derived fuch boldness, such considence in themselves; what chief had arisen since the death of the Scipios; who should command in their camp; with could have given the fignal for battle? Perplexed and aftonished at so many incidents, so unaccountable, they first gave way; and then, on being pushed with a vigorous onset, turned their backs: ' and now, either a dreadful havock would have been made

OF ROME.

438

BOOK made among the flying party, or the pursuers would have found their impetuofity turn out inconfiderate Y.R.540, and dangerous to themselves, had not Marcius B.C. 212. quickly sounded a retreat, and by stopping them in the front, and even holding back some with his own hands, repressed the fury of the troops. He then led them into the camp, with their rage for blood and flaughter still unabated. The Carthaginians at first retreated precipitately from the rampart; but when they saw that there was no pursuit, they imagined that the others had halted through fear; and then, as if holding them in contempt, they returned to their camp at an easy pace. Conformable to the fame notion was their careless manner of guarding their works; for although the Romans were at hand, yet they confidered them merely as the remains of the two armies vanquished a few days before: and, in confequence of this error, negligence prevailed among the Carthaginians in every particular. Marcius, having discovered this, resolved on an enterprife, at first view rather rash than bold: which was, to go and attack the enemy's post; for he confidered that it would be easier to storm the camp of Hasdrubal while he stood single, than to defend his own, in case the three generals and three armies should again unite; and besides, that, on one hand, should he succeed in his attempt, he would gain relief from the distresses that encompassed him, and, on the other, should he be repulsed, yet his daring to make the attack would rescue him from contempt.

> XXXVIII. However, left the fuddenness of the affair, and the apprehensions incident to men acting by night, might disconcert an undertaking which, at best, seemed but ill suited to his present condition, he judged it advisable to communicate his defign to the foldiers, and to animate their spirits. Accord-

Accordingly, being affembled, he addressed them BOOM a speech to this effect: "Soldiers, either my dutiful affection to our late commanders, both during Y.R. 540. their lives and fince their death, or the present B.C. 278. " fituation of us all, might be fufficient to convince every one of you, that the command with which " I am invested, though highly honourable, as the " gift of your judgment, is still in reality full of labour and anxiety. For at the time when (only that fear benumbs the fense of grief) I should "not be so far master of myself as to be able "to find any confolation for our losses, I am " compelled fingly to study the safety of you all; 44 a talk most difficult to a mind immersed in forrow; " so much so, that while I am devising the means of f preserving to our country these remnants of the two armies, I cannot, even in those moments, be "wholly abstracted from it. For bitter remembrance haunts me; and the two Scipios, by day " and by night, disquiet me with anxious cares and dreams, and often awake me out of fleep. They "charge me, not to let them, or their men (your " fellow-foldiers, who for eight years maintained in this country a fuperiority in arms), or our com-66 monwealth, remain unrevenged; to follow their "discipline, and their maxims; and that as, during "their lives, no one was more obedient to their commands than I was, fo I should, after their death, ever deem that conduct the best, which I 66 have most reason to think that they would have 46 purfued on any emergency. I could wish, foldiers, that you, on your part, would not pay them the tribute of tears and lamentations, as 44 if they were no longer in existence; they who 46 live and flourish in the fame of their atchieve-"ments; but that, whenever the memory of them " recurs, you would go into battle as if you faw 46 them encouraging you, and giving you the fignal. " Most Z 2

THE HISTORY

349 Y.R. 540.

Most certainly it must have been their image pre-" fenting itself to your eyes and minds that animated " you yesterday to that memorable action, in which " you gave the enemies a proof that the Roman " race had not become extinct with the Scipios, "and that the strength and valour of that nation, "which was not crushed by the disaster at Canna, " will ever rife superior to the severest inslictions of " fortune. Now, after you have, from the fugget-"tions of your own courage, braved danger with " fuch intrepidity, I wish to try how much of the " fame bravery you will exert under the direction " of your commander: for yesterday, when I gave "the fignal of retreat, on feeing you purfue the " routed Carthaginians with precipitation, I did not " mean to break your spirit, but to reserve it for a " more glorious and more advantageous opportu-" nity; that you might afterwards, in short, and " at a more favourable juncture, with full prepara-"tion, and well armed, affail your enemy unpre-" pared, unarmed, and even buried in fleep. "Nor, foldiers, did I conceive the hope of fuch 44 an occasion offering, inconsiderately, and with-" out reason, but sounded it on the real state of "things. Suppose any one should ask you, by " what means, with your small numbers, and after " fuffering a defeat, you defended your camp against numerous forces elated with victory; you " would furely give no other answer than that, be-" ing from these very circumstances apprehensive of " danger, you had strengthened your quarters on " every fide with works, and kept yourselves ready " and prepared for action. And this is always the " cale: men are least secure on that side, where " their fituation removes the apprehension of dan-" ger; because, wherever they think care unne-" ceffary, they will be there unguarded and open. "There is no one thing which the enemy at pre-

" fent less apprehend, than that we, so lately $00 $7 49 blockaded and affaulted, should have the confidence to affault their camp. Let us dare then Y.R. to do what no one will believe we dare to B.C. 272. " undertake: the very persuasion of its difficulty * will make it eafy to us. At the third watch of *6 the night I will lead you thither in filence. I know, certainly, that they have not a course of watches, nor regular guards. The noise of our " shout at their gates, and the first attack, will carry " the camp. Then, while they are torpid with Meep, difmayed by the fudden tumult, and furorifed, unarmed in their beds, let that carnage 66 be made, from which you were vexed at your being recalled yesterday. I am aware that the enterprise must appear presumptuous; but in et cases of difficulty, and when hopes are small, the most spirited counsels are the fafest; because 66 if, in the moment of opportunity, which quickly 66 fleets away, you hesitate, even but a little, you es will in vain wish for it afterwards, when it is no 46 more. They have one army in our neighbour-"hood, and two others at no great distance. 66 From an immediate attack we have reason to " expect fuccess; you have already made trial of 44 your own strength, and of theirs; but if we " defer the matter, and they, on being informed " of our behaviour in yesterday's irruption, cease 66 to look on us with contempt, it is probable that " all their commanders, and all their forces, will " unite in one body. In that case, can we hope to be able to withstand the enemy's three generals, " and three armies, whom Cneius Scipio, with his " army entire, could not withftand? As our gene-" rals were ruined by the dividing of their forces, " fo may the enemy, while separate and divided, " be overpowered. There is no other way in " which we can act with effect: let us therefore ŽZ

THE HISTORY

" wait for nothing beyond the opportunity which " the next night will afford us. Retire now, with " the favour of the gods; refresh yourselves with R. 640. "food and rest, that you may, strong and vigorous, " break into the camp of the enemy with the farme " spirit with which you defended your own." They heard with joy this new plan proposed by their new general, which pleafed them the more, on account of its daring boldness. The remainder of the day was employed in preparing their arms, and taking their victuals, and the greater part of the night was given to rest. At the fourth watch they were in motion.

> XXXIX. At the distance of fix miles beyond the nearest camp lay another body of Carthaginians. Between the two was a deep valley, thick fet with About the middle of this wood, by a stratagem worthy the genius of a Carthaginian, a Roman cohort and fome cavalry were placed in concealment. The communication being thus cut off, the rest of the troops were led in silence to the nearest body of the enemy, and finding no advanced guard before the gates, or watches on the rampart, they marched in, without meeting an opposer, as they would into their own camp. The charge was then founded, and the shout raised: some kill the assailed before they are quite awake, fome throw file on the huts which were covered with dry straw, some seize the gates to cut off their flight. The fire, the shouting, and the flaughter, all together, so stunned and confounded the enemy's fendes, that they neither could hear each other, nor think of what they should do. Unarmed, they every where fell in among troops of aimed foes: fome haftened to the gates; others, finding the passes shut, leaped over the rampart: and every one, as foon as he got out, fled directly towards the other camp. These were intercepted intercepted by the cohort and cavalry rushing out BOOK from their ambush, and were all stain to a man; and even had any escaped, the Romans, having taken Y.R. sie the nearer camp, ran forward to the other with such B.C. 218.

haste, that no one could have arrived before them with the news of the difaster. At this camp, if lay at a greater distance from an enemy, and as many had gone out before day in quest of forage, wood, and booty, they found every thing in a still more neglected and careless state; the weapons only standing at the out-posts, the men unarmed, sitting or lying on the ground, or walking about before the gates and rampart. In this unguarded fituation they were attacked by the Romans, yet warm from the late fight, and flushed with victory. No opposition therefore could be given them at the entrances; within, indeed, the first shout and the tumult having brought many together from all parts of the camp, a fierce conflict arose, which would have lasted long, had not the fight of the blood on the shields of the Romans, discovered to the Carthaginians the defeat of their other party, and struck them with dismay. This panic occasioned a general flight; every one, except fuch as the fword overtook, rushing out wherever a passage could be found. Thus, in one night and day, through the fuccessful conduct of Lucius Marcius, were two of the Carthaginian camps taken by ftorm. Claudius, who translated the annals of Acilius from the Greek language into the Latin, affirms, that there were thirty-feven thousand of the enemy killed, one thousand eight hundred and thirty taken, and a vast booty acquired; among which was a filver shield of an hundred and thirty-eight pounds weight, emboffed with the image of the Barcine Haldrubal. Valerius Antias fays, that Mago's camp only was taken, where feven thousand were killed; and that, in the other battle, when the Romans fallied out and fought Hasdrubal, ten thousand fell, and that four thousand three hundred

THE HISTORY

20 K dred and thirty were taken. Pifo writes, that Magne having halfily pursued our troops who were retreating, five thousand of his men were killed in an and E, 212. bufcade. All mention the name of the commander Marcius, with great honour; and to his real glow they add also miraculous incidents; among other that while he was haranguing his men, a flame feen at the top of his head, without being felt by him, to the great fright of the furrounding foldiers. It is faid, that, as a monument of his victory over the Carthaginians, the shield with the image of Hasdrubal, styled the Marcian, remained in the Capitol until the burning of that temple *. this, hostilities were suspended in Spain for a long time, both parties being unwilling, after fuch fevere shocks given and received, to risk an action which might be wholly destructive to one or both.

> XL. During the time of these transactions in Spain, Marcellus having, after the taking of Syracuse, adjusted the other affairs of Sicily with such integrity and good faith as augmented not only his own glory, but likewise the majesty of the Roman people, carried off to Rome the ornaments of the city, the statues and pictures with which it abounded. These were no doubt the spoils of enemies, and acquired by the right of war, yet they first gave rife to a taste for the works of Grecian artists, and to the confequent unbounded rapacity with which all places, indifcriminately, both facred and prophane, have been plundered; and which, at last, has been exercifed even against the deities of Rome, and that very temple itself, in the first instance, which was decorated by Marcellus with peculiar elegance: for formerly, those which he dedicated near the Capuan gate were visited by foreigners on account of their exquisite ornaments, of which a very small be moretion remains. Supplicatory embassies came to parcellus from almost every state in Sicily: as their V.R. wifes were diffimilar, fo were the terms granted B. them. Such as either had not revolted, or had remined into amity, before the reduction of Syracuse, received as faithful allies, and treated with kindness; while such as, after that event, had submitted through fear, being confidered as conquered, had terms dictated to them by the victor. however, the Romans had remaining, at Agrigentum, some enemies far from contemptible—Epicydes and Hanno, who had been commanders in the late war, with a third and new one, fent by Hannibal in the room of Hippocrates, of a Lybophænician race, a native of Hippo, called by his countrymen Mutines, an enterprising man, and instructed under no less a master than Hannibal himself in all the arts of war. To him Epicydes and Hanno affigned the auxiliary Numidians; with these he overran the lands of their enemies in such a manner, and was fo active in visiting their allies for the purpose of securing their fidelity, and of giving them fuccour as occasion required, that, in a short time, he filled all Sicily with his fame, and was confidered as one of the principal supports of the Carthaginian party. The Carthaginian general therefore, and the Syracusan, who had hitherto remained shut up within the walls of Agrigentum, were induced, not only by the advice of Mutines, but by confidence in their strength, to venture out of the town; and they pitched their camp on the bank of the river Honera. When Marcellus was informed of this, he instantly put his troops in motion, and fat down, at the difance of about four miles from them, to observe their motions and intentions. But Mutines left him neither room nor time for deliberation, for he c offed the river, and charged his advanced guards with fuch fury as to cause great terror and disorder. dav.

^{*} In the year of Rome 669.

THE HISTORY

B.C. 2.

O K day, in a kind of regular engagement, he drove the Romans back into their fortifications. He was then called away by a mutiny of the Numidians which broke out in the camp; and as about three hundred of them had retired to a town called Heraclea of Minos. he went thither, in order to pacify and bring them back. At his departure he is faid to have recomme mended earnestly to the other generals not to come to an engagement with the enemy during his ab-This gave much offence to both, particularly to Hanno, who was already jealous of his reputation; "that Mutines should dictate to him; a mongrest "African to a Carthaginian general, commissioned "by the fenate and people." He prevailed on Epicydes, who was difinclined to the measure, to confent that they should cross the river, and offer battle; alleging, that if they waited for Mutines. and the issue of the battle should prove fortunate, the honour would all be ascribed to him.

> XLI. Marcellus, fired with indignation at the thought that he, who had beaten off from Nola, Hannibal, when elated with his victory at Cannæ, should give way to such adversaries as these, and whom he had repeatedly defeated on land and fea, ordered his men to take arms hastily, and march out to meet them. While he was arranging his troops, ten Numidians from the enemy's line came to him at full gallop, and told him, that their countrymen, influenced first by the same motive which caused the mutiny, in which three hundred of their number had retired to Heraclea, and fecondly, by feeing their own commander, at the very eve of a battle, fent out of the way, by officers who wished to derogate from his merit, had resolved to remain inactive during the fight. Contrary to the infidious character of their nation, they fulfilled their promife. This added new spirits to the Romans, for the intelligence was quickly conveyed along the ranks.

ranks, that the enemy were forfaken by their horse, Book which had been confidered as the most formidable XXV. part of their force. At the same time, it damped the courage of the Carthaginians, who, besides see- B.C. 272. ing themselves deprived of the support of the princinal part of their strength, became even apprehenfive of being attacked by their own cavalry. There was therefore no great contest: the first onset decided the affair. The Numidians stood quiet, on the wings, during the action, and when they faw their confederates turning their backs, accompanied them only a short way on their flight; for, observing that all in confusion made towards Agrigentum, in order to avoid the hardships of a siege, they withdrew themselves into several of the neighbouring cities. Many thousands were killed, and many taken, together with eight elephants. This was the last battle fought by Marcellus in Sicily, after which he returned in triumph to Syracuse. The year was now near to a close. The Roman senate therefore decreed that Publius Cornelius, prætor, should write to the confuls at Capua, that while Hannibal was at a great distance, and no business of moment was going on there, one of them should, if they thought proper, come to Rome to elect new magistrates. On receiving the letter, the confuls fettled between themselves, that Claudius should hold the elections, and Fulvius remain at Capua. Claudius elected confuls, Cneius Fulvius Centumalus, and Publius Sulpicius Galba, fon of Servius, who had not before held any curule office. Then Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, Marcus Cornelius Cethegus, Caius Sulpicius, and Caius Calpurnius Pifo were elected prætors. The city jurisdiction fell to Piso, Sicily to Sulpicius, Apulia to Cethegus, and Sardinia to Lentulus. The prefent confuls were continued in command for the ensuing year.

HISTORY OF ROME

BOOK XXVI.

Hannibal encamps upon the banks of the Anio, within three miles of Rome. Attended by two thousand horsemen, he advances close to the Colline gate, to take a view of the walls and situation of the city. On two successive days the hostile armies are hindered from engaging by the severity of the weather. Capua taken by Quintus Fulvius and Appius Claudius: the chief nobles die, voluntarily, by poison. Quintus Fulvius, having condemned the principal fenators to death, at the moment they are actually tied to the stakes, receives dispatches from Rome, commanding him to spare their lives, which he postpones reading, until the sentence is executed. Publius Scipio, offering himself for the service, is sent to command in Spain: takes New Carthage in one day. Successes in Sicily. Treaty of friendship with the Ætolians. War with Philip, King of Macedonia, and the Acarnanians.

Publius Sulpicius Galba, as foon as they came into office, on the ides of March, convened the february into the fate of the commonwealth, the method of conducting the war, and the disposition of the provinces and armies. Quintus Fulvius and Appius Claudius,

THE HISTORY OF ROME.

Claudius, the confuls of the preceding year, were BOOK continued in command; the legions which they had XXVI. at present, were decreed to them, and an injunction Y.R 544, was added, that they should not quit the siege of B.C. 211. Capua, until they had reduced the place. This was a point on which the Romans kept their attention fixed with particular folicitude, not only from refentment, for which no state ever gave juster cause, but from the confideration, that a city fo eminent and powerful, as it had, by its revolt, drawn feveral states into the same measure, would probably, if recovered, dispose their minds to wish for a reconciliation with the government under which they had formerly lived. Two prætors also, of the preceding year, were continued in command, Marcus Junius in Etruria, and Publius Sempronius in Gaul, each with the two legions which he then had. Marcellus was also continued, that he might, in quality of proconful, finish the remainder of the war in Sicily, with the army then under his command. Directions were given him, that he should take the complement requifite for completing the numbers of his troops, if that should be necessary, out of the legions which Publius Cornelius, proprætor, commanded in Sicily; conditionally, however, that he should not choose any soldier from among those who had been prohibited by the fenate from 1eceiving a discharge, or returning home before the conclusion of the war. To Caius Sulpicius, whose lot was the province of Sicily, were decreed the two legions formerly commanded by Publius Cornelius, and a supply of men from the army of Cneius Fulvius, which had been shamefully defeated and put to flight, the year before, in Apulia. For the foldiers of this description the senate had fixed the fame term of fervice as for those concerned at Cannæ; and, as a farther mark of ignominy to both, it was ordered, that they should not reside during the winter in towns, nor build their winter huts nearer

THE HISTORY

1350

BOOK nearer to any town than ten miles. To Lucius XXVI. Cornelius, in Sardinia, the two legions were given which Quintus Murius had commanded; a fupply T.R. 541. of men, if requisite, the consuls were ordered to enlift. Titus Otacilius and Marcus Valerius were ordered, with the fleets and legions then under their command, to guard the coasts of Greece and Sicily. On the former station were employed fifty ships and one legion; on the latter, one hundred ships and two legions. Twenty-three Roman legions were, this year, employed in the war on land and fea.

> II. In the beginning of the year, on a letter from Lucius Marcius being laid before the fenate, that affembly declared his fervices highly meritorious; but his assuming a title of honour (for, unauthorised either by order of the people or direction of the fenate, he had, in addressing the senate, styled himfelf proprætor,) gave general offence. They deemed it "a precedent of pernicious tendency, that com-" manders should be chosen by the troops; and that "the established privileges of assemblies, held under " auspices, should be transferred to a giddy soldiery, " in camps and provinces remote from the magif-" trates and laws." Several were of opinion, that the fenate should take the matter into confideration; but it was judged more expedient to defer any notice of it until after the departure of the meffengers who brought the letter from Marcius. It was agreed, that an answer should be sent to him, respecting provisions and clothing for the army, saying that the fenate would take care of both those matters: but it was resolved that it should not be addressed to Lucius Marcius, proprætor, lest he should confider, as determined, a question which they had referved for future discussion. After the couriers were dismissed, the first business proposed by the confuls, and which was unanimously agreed upon, was, that application should be made to the plebeian BOOK tribunes, to take the sense of the commons with XXVI. all convenient speed, as to what person they would Y.R. 342. - choose to be fent into a Spain with a commission to BC. 214. command the army lately under Cneius Scipio. The tribunes were advised with accordingly, and the question was published for consideration: but people's thoughts thoughts were wholly engrossed by a contest on another fubject: Caius Sempronius Blæsus, having instituted a profecution against Cneius Fulvius, on account of the loss of the army in Apulia, inveighed against him continually in public harangues; affirming that "al-"though many commanders had, through rashness 46 and unskilfulness, brought their armies into situa-44 tions of extreme danger, yet never had any one, " except Cneius Fulvius, corrupted his legions with every kind of vice before he exposed them to de-" struction: so that it might be faid, with truth, "that-their ruin was effected before they had even " feen an enemy; and that they were vanquished, " not by Hannibal, but by their own commander. " No elector could too carefully scrutinize the cha-" racter of the person to whom he was entrusting an " army. What a difference between this man and "Tiberius Sempronius! The latter, though the " army committed to him confifted of flaves, yet, "by proper discipline and wise regulations, had uickly improved them to such a degree, that, in "the field of battle, not one of them evinced by his " conduct either his condition or his birth; and they became a safeguard to the allies, a terror to "the enemy. They fnatched, as it were, out of "Hannibal's grasp, and restored to the Roman people, "the cities of Cumæ, Beneventum, and several 66 others; whereas Cneius Fulvius, having received 44 an army of Roman citizens, honourably born and liberally educated, had debauched them by " all the low vices of flaves, and funk them into " fuch a state of degeneracy, that they were info-" lent

THE HISTORY

B.C. 211.

BOOK " lent and turbulent among the allies, spiritless " and dastardly among foes; and so far from " withstanding the attack of the Carthagians, they "withstood not even their shout. Nor, indeed, " was it wonderful that the foldiers did not stand "their ground in battle, when their commander " was the first who fled. For his part, he rather wondered that any of them had fallen in their 66 posts, and that they did not, one and all, accom-" pany Cneius Fulvius in his panic and flight. " Caius Flaminius, Lucius Paullus, Lucius Postu-" mius, Cneius and Publius Scipio, had chosen ra-"ther to fall in fight, than to abandon their troops " in a desperate situation. But Cneius Fulvius was " almost the only messenger who brought to Rome "the news of his army being cut off. It was con-" trary," he faid, " to every rule of honour and " equity, that the troops engaged at Cannæ, be-" cause they fled out of the field, should be trans-" ported into Sicily, and prohibited from returning "thence before the termination of the war in Italy, " and that a decree, to the same purport, should " have been lately passed in the case of the legions " under the command of Cneius Fulvius, while 66 Cneius Fulvius himself, after running away from " a battle brought on by his own temerity, should " escape all punishment; that he should spend his " old age where he had spent his youth, in the 46 stews and brothels, while his foldiers, who were 66 no otherwise culpable than in resembling their "commander, were cast out, in a manner, into exile, condemned to a fervice of ignominy. " unequal was the dispensation of liberty at Rome to the rich and to the poor; to the man who had " arrived at honours, and to those who still conti-" nued in obscurity."

> III. Fulvius endeavoured to transfer the guilt from himself to the soldiers; afferting, that " in " confe-

" consequence of their insisting violently on fight- BOOK " ing, they were led out to the field, not on the XXVI. " fame day on which they defired it, because it was Y.R.541. "then evening, but on the day following, when B.C. 21# 66 both the time and the ground were favourable " to them; but that they were so overawed, either by the reputation or the strength of the enemy, "that they did not make a stand. " the hurry of the general flight, he was carried "away by the crowd, as had been the case of "Varro, at the battle of Cannæ, and of many other " generals. And how could he, by this fingle " refistance, serve the cause of the commonwealth; "unless, indeed, his death were considered as a " remedy for the public misfortunes? He had not 66 been brought into any dangerous fituation by want of provisions, or by want of caution; nei-"ther was he, in consequence of marching un-"guardedly, furprised by an ambuscade, but de-" feated by open force, by dint of arms, in a fair " engagement; nor had he the power of deter-" mining the degree of courage to be exerted either "by his own men, or by the enemy: every man's " own disposition supplied either courage or cow-" ardice." The matter came twice to a hearing, and, at both times, the penalty was laid at a fine. At the third hearing, witnesses were produced; and, besides his being loaded with charges of the most fcandalous nature, great numbers deposed on oath, that the prætor was the first who shewed any symptoms of fear, and began the flight; and that the foldiers, being abandoned by him, and supposing that the general's fears were not without grounds, fled likewise; on which, the anger of the people was inflamed to fuch a pitch, that the whole affembly cried out that the profecution ought to be capital. On this point a new contest arose: for, as the tribune had, on two former occasions, profecuted the offence as finable, and at a third, proposed to BOOK profecute it as a capital, an appeal was made to the XXVI. tribunes of the commons. They declared, that " they could not debar their colleague from profe-YR 541. "cuting, as, by the practice of former times, he had a right to do, either on the written laws, or " the general practice, until he should obtain judg-"ment, either of capital punishment, or a fine, against the defendant a private person." Then Sempronius gave notice, that he demanded judgment of treason against Cneius Fulvius; and he made a requisition to the city prætor, Caius Calpurnius, to appoint a day for the affembly. The accused then rested his hopes on another expedient, the procuring at his trial the support of his brother, Quintus Fulvius, who, at this time, stood high in the public esteem, both on account of the merit of his past fervices, and the expectation of his speedily reducing Capua. But Fulvius having fent a petition to this purpose, couched in terms calculated to excite compassion, as in a case where a brother's life was concerned, and the fenate answering, that his quitting Capua would be injurious to the public interest, Cneius Fulvius, at the approach of the day appointed for the affembly, withdrew into exile to Tarquinii. The commons passed an order confirming his banishment as legal.

AA

profecute

> IV. In the mean-time, the grand operations of the campaign were directed against Capua, where, however, the fiege was carried on, rather by a close blockade than by vigorous assaults. This caused fo great a famine, that the populace and the flaves could no longer endure it, and yet there was no way of fending messengers to Hannibal, the approaches were all fo strictly guarded. At length a. Numidian was found, who, taking a letter, engaged to make his way with it; and, going out by night, he passed through the middle of the Roman camp. This encouraged the Campanians to try, while they had any remains of vigour, what might be done BOOK by fallies from all fides of the town. In many XXVI. engagements which followed, their cavalry were Y.R.541 generally fuccessful, their infantry worsted: but the B.C. befiegers were not nearly fo much pleafed by the advantages which they had gained, as mortified at being overcome, in any particular, by an enemy befieged, and on the point of being taken. last the Romans adopted a method of supplying by art their deficiency in strength. Out of all the legions were felected young men, who, from the power and lightness of their bodies, possessed the greatest agility: to these were given bucklers, shorter than those of the cavalry, and to each seven javelins four feet long, pointed with iron, in the same manner as the miffile javelins now used by the light infantree. The cavalry, each taking one of these behind him on his horse, taught them, by frequent exercise, so to ride, and to difmount quickly, when the fignal was given. As foon as, from daily practice, they feemed to perform this with fufficient expertness, they were led out into a plain, between the camp and the walls, against the cavalry of the Campanians, who stood there in order of battle. When they came within a weapon's cast, these light footmen difmounted, and, forming in a moment, instead of cavalry, a line of infantry ran forward against the enemy's horse; and, as they advanced, discharged their javelins, one after another, with great fury; by the vast number of which, thrown against men and horses indiscriminately, very many were wounded. But the novelty and unexpectedness of such a proceeding caused still greater fright; and, while they were in this diforder, the cavalry made their charge, and drove them back even to their gates with great flaughter. Henceforward the Romans had the fuperiority in the field in respect of both horse and foot. It was then made an established regulation, that in all the legions there should be light infantry of this AA2

fort,

BOOK fort, who are called velites. We are told, that the XXVI. person who had advised the mixing of footmen with Y.R.541. the cavalry was Quintus Navius, a centurion; and B.C. 211. that he was, on that account, highly honoured by the general.

> V. While affairs at Capua were in this state, Hannibal's judgment was long fuspended between his wishes, on one hand, to acquire possession of the citadel of Tarentum, and, on the other, to retain Capua. At length, however, he determined in favour of the latter; because on that object he saw that the attention of all men, both friends and enemies, was fixed; as the fate of that city would demonstrate what kind of consequences were to be expected from revolting from the Romans. Leaving, therefore, in Bruttium, the greatest part of his baggage, and all his heavier armed troops, and felecting fuch of the infantry and cavalry as were best qualified for an expeditious march, he took the route to Campania. Notwithstanding he went with much speed, yet he was followed by thirty-three elephants. In a retired valley behind Mount Tifata, which overhangs Capua, he halted; and having, at his coming, taken the fort of Galatia, from which he dislodged the garrison by force, he prepared to act against the besiegers. He sent forward to the besieged information of the time when he intended to affault the Roman camp, in order that they might be in readiness, and pour out at once from all the gates. This gave the besiegers a most violent alarm: for, while he carried on his attack on one fide, all the Campanians, both horse and foot, and with them the Carthaginian garrison, commanded by Bostar and Hanno, fallied out on the other. In this dangerous fituation the Romans, left by running together to one part they should leave any other unguarded, divided their forces in this manner: Appius Claudius to Hannibal; Caius Nero, proprætor, with the ca- XXVI. valry of the fixth legion, took post on the road Y.R. car. leading to Suesfula, and Caius Fulvius Flaccus, lieu-B.C. 223.

tenant-general, with the cavalry of the confederates, on the fide opposite the river Vulturnus. The fight began with the usual shouting and tumult. besides the other noises of men, horses, and weapons, the multitude of Campanians, unable to bear arms, being spread along the walls, raised so loud a shout, accompanied with the clangor of brazen instruments, such as is commonly made in the dead of night on occasion of eclipses of the moon, that it drew the attention even of the combatants. Appius eafily repulfed the Campanians from the rampart. Hannibal and his Carthaginians, a more powerful force, pressed hard on Fulvius. There the fixth legion gave way to the enemy, and, on its being broken, a cohort of Spaniards with three elephanis pushed through to the very rampart. had made an effectual breach in the Roman line; but while flattered, on the one hand, with the hope of forcing into the camp, it was threatened on the other with being cut off from the main body of the army. When Fulvius faw the dastardly behaviour of the legion, and the danger of the camp, he exhorted Quintus Navius, and the other principal centurions, to fall on that cohort that was fighting close to the rampart, and to cut it in pieces; he observed to them, that "the juncture was critical " in the last degree; that these men must either be " allowed a passage — and then they would break " into the camp with less labour than they had " exerted in forcing their way through a thick line " of troops, — or they must be dispatched at the " foot of the rampart. This would not be a mat-"ter of much contest; they were few in number, 66 and shut out from their friends, and the very " breach.

XXVI. Y.R.541. B.C. 211.

BOOK "breach, which, while the Romans were dispirited, was feen in their line, would, if they faced about upon the foe, prove the means of inclosing and attacking them on all fides at once." Navius, on hearing these words of the general, took, from the standard-bearer, the standard of the second company of spearmen, and advanced with it against the enemy, threatening to throw it into the midst of them if the foldiers did not infantly follow him, and take a share in the fight. His person was very large, and the standard, raised alost, attracted the eyes of all. When he came up to the front of the Spaniards, showers of javelins were poured on him from all fides, almost the whole body directing their attacks against him alone; but neither the multitude of the enemies, nor the force of their weapons, could repel the onfet of this fingle combatant.

> VI. At the fame time, Marcus Atilius, a lieutenant-general, caused the standard of the first company of principes belonging to the same legion to be brought forward against the enemy. The officers commanding in the camp, Lucius Porcius Licinus and Titus Popilius, lieutenants-general, fought with vigour in defence of their trenches, and killed on the very rampart some elephants in the act of attempting to cross it. The bodies of these filling up the ditch, as by a mound or a bridge, afforded a paffage to the affailants, and a desperate flaughter was made here, fighting on the bodies of the dead elephants. On the other fide of the camp, the Campanians and the Carthaginian garrison had been repulsed, and the fight was now maintained close to the gate of Capua, which opens toward the city of Vulturnus. The Romans were hindered from forcing their way in, not so much by the arms of the foldiers, as by the balliftæ and scorpions with with which the gate was furnished; and which, by BOOK the missile weapons they threw, kept the assailants XXVI. at a great distance. The ardour of the Romans Y.R. 343. was, besides, checked by their commander, Ap- B.C. 2213 pius Claudius, being wounded; for while he was encouraging his men in the van, he received a thrust from a javelin in the upper part of his breast below the left shoulder. Nevertheless a vast number of the enemy was killed before the gate, and the rest were driven in disorder into the city. When Hannibal faw that the Spanish cohort was slain to a man, and that the Romans maintained the defence of their camp with the utmost degree of vigour, he gave over the affault, and began to retreat; making his line of infantry face about, and the cavalry cover their rear against any attack. The legions were ardently intent on pursuing the enemy; but Flaccus ordered a retreat to be founded, supposing that enough had been done to make the Campanian, and Hannibal himself, sensible, how little able he was to protect them. Some who have written accounts of this battle inform us, that there were flain on that day, of Hannibal's army, eight thousand men, and three thousand of the Campanians; and that fifteen standards were taken from the Carthaginians, eighteen from the Campanians. In other accounts I find that the importance of the battle was not by any means fo great, and that there was more of alarm in the case, than of fighting; that a party of Numidians and Spaniards, with some elephants, having, by furprife, broken into the Roman camp, the elephants going through the middle of it overthrew the tents with great noise, so that the beasts of burden broke their collars and ran about frightened; that to increase the disorder a stratagem was used, Hannibal sending in some persons who could speak the Latin language, of whom he had many, giving orders, in the name of the confuls, that, as the camp was loft, every man thould fly, as he was 'A A 4 able.

B.C. 211.

BOOK able, to the nearest mountains; but that the impo-XXVI. sition was quickly detected, and its progress stopped by a great flaughter of the enemy, and that the elephants were driven out of the camp with firebrands. This battle, in whatfoever manner begun and ended, was the last that was fought previous to the furrender of Capua. The mediatuticus, or chief magistrate of the Campanians, for this year, was Seppius Lefius, a man of obscure birth and small property. There is a story, that, at a former time, when his mother was, in his behalf (he being under age), expiating a prodigy which happened in the family, the aruspex answered her, that the supreme power at Capua would come to that boy: on which, knowing no circumstance that could countenance such an expectation, she replied, "What you say supposes the " affairs of the Campanians in a truly desperate " state, when the supreme magistracy is to come "to my fon." This expression, meant in derision of a true prediction, proved itself true in the event; for the people being distressed by the sword and by famine, and destitute of every kind of hope, those who were entitled by birth to expect the posts of honour, declining to accept them, Lesius, who exclaimed that Capua was deferted and betrayed by the nobility, obtained the post of supreme magistrate, and was the last Campanian who held it.

> VII. Hannibal, feeing that he could neither bring the enemy to another engagement, nor force a paffage through their camp into Capua, and fearing, lest the new consuls might cut off his supplies of provisions, determined to drop a design in which he had no prospect of success, and to remove from the place. To what quarter he should next direct his route was then to be refolved; and, while he was earnestly deliberating on this head, he felt his mind strongly impelled to make an attempt on Rome itself, the grand fource of the war: a measure always

always ardently wished for, and the omission of BOOK which, on the favourable occasion after the battle of XXVI. Cannæ, was generally censured by others, and not Y.R. 541. defended by himself. He thought that he need not B.C. 211. despair of gaining possession of some part of the city during the panic and tumult which his unexpected approach would occasion; and that when Rome should be in danger, either both the commanders, or at least one of them, would leave Capua; and that, should they divide their forces, this, by weakening both, would afford either him or the Campanians a chance of acting with success. One confideration made him uneafy, that, on his departure, the Capuans might perhaps immediately furrender. He therefore, by rewards, engaged a Numidian, who was of a disposition to undertake any thing for pay, to be the bearer of a letter to the people, and, going into the Roman camp in character of a deferter, to pass out privately on the other fide to Capua. This letter was full of encouragements to hold out: "his departure," he told them, "would prove the means of their fafety, as it "would draw away the Roman generals and armies " from before Capua to the defence of Rome." He exhorted them "not to let their spirits sink; tor 66 by patient resolution, for a few days, they would "free themselves entirely from the siege." He then ordered all the veffels on the river Vulturnus to be feized, and brought up to a fort which he had before erected for the fecurity of his camp. As foon as he was informed that a fufficient number of thefe had been procured to carry over his troops, he led.

VIII. That this step was intended, Fulvius Flaccus had discovered, from deserters, before it, was put in execution; and had apprised the senate of them down by night to the river, provided with victuals for ten days, and, before morning, they gained the other fide.

it

Y.R.541. B.C.211.

BOOK it by a letter fent to Rome, where men's minds were XXVI. varicusly affected by the intelligence. At a meeting of the fenate, which was immediately convened on this alarming emergency, Publius Cornelius, furnamed Afina, recommended, that all concern about Capua, with every other matter, should be laid aside, and all the generals and armies called home, from every part of Italy, for the defence of the capital. Fabins Maximus represented it as utterly difgraceful to retire from Copua, and to let their fears be excited, and their motions directed, by every nod and menace of Hannibal. "Was it credible," he faid, " that he, who after gaining the victory of Cannæ " had not dared to approach the city, should now, " after being repulfed from Capua, conceive an " expectation of taking Rome? His purpole in " coming was not to attack Rome, but to raise the " fiege of Capua. As to Rome, Jupiter and the " rest of the gods, witnesses of the treatise broken " by Hannibal, would, with the troops then in the " city, defend it." These opposite opinions were both rejected, and that of Publius Valerius Flaccus, which pointed out a middle course, was adopted. He advised, that due attention should be paid to both the affairs in question, and that a letter should be fent to the generals commanding at Capua, informing them of the force then in that city, mentioning that "they themselves know what number " of troops Hannibal brought with him, and how " many were necessary for carrying on the siege " of Capua;" and directing, that " if one of the 66 generals and a part of the army could be fent " to Rome, and, at the same time, the siege be " properly carried on by the remaining troops, and " the other general; then, that Claudius and Fulvius " should fettle between themselves which should 66 conduct the fiege of Capua, and which should " come home to defend their native city in any attack." A decree of the senate, to this effect, having having been passed and carried to Capua, Quintus BOOK. Fulvius, proconful, whose part it was to go to Rome, XXVI. his colleague being indisposed in consequence of his Y.R.541. wound, having selected out of the three armies B.C.211. fifteen thousand foot and one thousand horse, conveyed them over the Vulturnus. Having learned with certainty that Hannibal intended to go by the Latine road, he dispatched couriers before him to the corporate towns on and near the Appian road, Setia, Cora, and Lanuvium, with orders that the people of those places should not only have provisions prepared for their use, but also bring them down to the road from the lands which lay out of the way; and that they should draw together bodies of foldiers into their towns, that every man might stand forth in defence of his own state.

IX. Hannibal, after paffing the Vulturnus, encamped for that day at a small distance from the river. On the day following, he passed by Cales, and came into the Sidicinian territory, where he halted one day to lay it waste; and then marched along the Latine way through the territories of Suessa. Allifæ and Casinum. Under the walls of Casinum he remained encamped two days, ravaging the country round. Proceeding thence by Interamna and Aquinum, he came into the Fregellan region, to the river Liris, where he found the bridge broken down by the people with defign to check his progress. On the other hand, Fulvius had met a delay at the Vulturnus, for Hannibal had burned the thips, and he found great difficulty, in a place where timber was exceedingly fcarce, to procure rafts for transporting his army. But this being at length effected, the rest of his march was easy and expeditious; for, not only in the towns, but on both fides of the road, he was accommodated with plenty of provisions; while the foldiers cheerfully exhorted each other to quicken their pace, in the confideration

that

Y.R.541

BOOK that they were going to defend their native city. XXVI. At Rome, a meffenger from Fregella, who had, without stopping, travelled a day and a night, caused a most violent alarm; which, being augmented by people running up and down, and adding groundless circumstances to what they had heard, put the whole city into a tumultuous ferment. The lamentations of the women were not only heard from the private houses; but the matrons in all quarters, rushing out into the public streets, ran to all the temples, where they fwept the altars with their dishevelled hair, fell on their knees, and with hands raifed up towards the heavens and the gods, prayed that they would rescue the city of Rome from the attempts of its enemies, and preferve from hostile violence the Roman mothers, and their little children. The fenate remained affembled at the Forum, that the magistrates there might, on any occasion, consult them readily. Some accepted commands of parties, and repaired to the feveral posts to execute their duties; others offered their fervices wherever they. might be requifite. Guards were posted in the citadel, in the Capitol, on the walls, on the outfide of the city, and likewife on the Alban mount. and in the fort of Æsula. In the midst of this confusion, news arrived that Quintus Fulvius, proconful, had fet out with an army from Capua; and left his authority should be diminished by his coming into the city*, the fenate passed a decree that Quintus Fulvius should have equal power with the confuls. Hannibal, after ravaging the lands of Fregella with particular feverity, in refentment for the breaking down the bridges, came

^{*} He would have lost all authority on coming into the city; for, within the walls, a proconful had no jurisdiction. Whenever, therefore, a proconful obtained a triumph or an ovation, it was necessary to procure an order of the people, investing him with the authority of a magistrate during that day.

through the territories of Frusino, Ferentinum, and BOOK Anagnia, into that of Lavici; thence purfuing his XXVI. route through Algidum to Tusculum, where, being Y.R.541. refused admittance into the town, he marched to- B.C. 211. wards the right, to Gabii, and bringing down his army from thence into the lands of the Pupinian tribe, pitched his camp eight miles from Rome. In proportion as he came nearer to the city, the greater was the number of its fugitives flain by the Numidians, who advanced before him; and very many prisoners, of all ranks and ages, were taken.

X. During this general commotion Fulvius Flaccus, with his army, entered Rome through the Capuan gate, and proceeded along the middle of the city, and through the Carinæ, to the Esquiliæ; where, passing out, he pitched his tents between the Esquiline and Colline gates. The plebeian ædiles brought thither provisions for the troops: the confuls and fenate came into the camp, and there held their confultations on the measures requisite in the present state of affairs. It was then resolved, that the confuls should encamp before the Colline and Esquiline gates; that Caius Calpurnius, city prætor, should command in the Capitol and citadel; and that the fenate should be kept affembled, in full numbers, in the Forum, as fudden exigencies might probably require their confideration. Meanwhile, Hannibal moved his camp forward to the river Anio, three miles from the city, and posting there his troops, he himself, with two thousand horsemen, proceeded from the Colline gate as far as the temple of Hercules, riding about, and taking as near a view as he could of the fortifications and fituation of the city. Flaccus, ashamed of his being suffered to do this, and fo much at his ease, sent out a party of cavalry against him, with orders to make those of the enemy retire into their camp. When the fight BOOK fight began, the confuls ordered a body of Mani-XXVI. dian deferters, who were then on the Aventine to the number of twelve hundred), to march aeross the middle of the city to the Esquilize, judging that none would be better qualified to act among the hollows, and garden walls, and tombs, and inclosed roads in that quarter. Some persons, seeing from the Capitol and citadel these men filing off on horse back, on the brow of the Publician hill, cried out, that the Aventine was taken; and this incident caused such confusion and terror, that, if the Carthaginian camp had not been just at the outside of the walls, the whole multitude would, in their consternation, have rushed out there. As it was, they ran back into the houses, and up to the roofs, from whence they poured down stones and weapons on their own foldiers passing the streets, whom they took for enemies. Nor could the commotion be fuppressed, or the mistake rectified, so thronged were the streets with crowds of peafants and cattle, which the fudden alarm had driven into the city. party of Numidian cavalry were fuccessful against the enemy, and drove them away. As it was necessary to suppress in various different places the many difturbances which were continually arifing on every flight occasion, a decree was passed, that all who had been dictators, confuls, or cenfors, should have the authority of magistrates, until the foe should retire from the walls. By this means a great many tumults, which were raifed without foundation, during the remainder of that day, and the following night, were entirely crushed.

B.C. 211.

> XI. Next day, Hannibal, crossing the Anie; drew up his forces in order of battle; nor did Flaccus and the confuls decline the challenge. When the armies on both fides flood nearly marshalled for the decision of a contest of such magnitude, where the was to be the prize of the con- BOOK quesor, a prodigious shower of rain, mixed with hail, fo grievously annoyed both parties, that, Y.R.541. scarcely able to hold their arms, they retired to their B.C. 212. respective camps, not moved, in the flightest degree, by any fear of their adversaries. On the next day, likewife, when the armies were formed on the same ground, the same kind of storm separated them: and, as foon as they had retired, the weather became wonderfully ferene and calm. This was confidered by the Carthaginians as portentous; and, we are told, that Hannibal was heard to fay, that "fome-" times the will, fometimes the power of taking "the city of Rome, was denied him." His hopes were also damped by two other incidents; one of fome weight, the other trivial. The more important was, that, while he lay with his army under the walls of the city of Rome, he understood that a reinforcement of foldiers for Spain had marched out, with standards borne before them. The one of less importance was, and which he learned from a prifoner, that, at this very time, the ground, whereon his camp stood, happened to be fold, and the price was not in the least lowered on that account. It appeared to him fo great an infult, that a purchaser should be found at Rome for that ground which he actually held and possessed by right of conquest, that he immediately called a crier, and ordered him to fet up to fale the filversmiths' shops, which at that time stood round the Roman Forum. Discouraged by all these circumstances, he moved his camp to the river Tutia, fix miles from the city, and proceeded thence to the grove of Feronia, where was attemple at that time, much celebrated for its riches; the Capenatians and other neighbouring flates being accustomed to bring hither the first fruits of their lands, and other offerings, according to their abilities, by which means it was decorated with abundance of gold and filver: of all these offerings

the

168

BOOK offerings the temple was then despoiled. XXVI. Hannibal's departure, large heaps of brais were found in it, the foldiers having, through remorfe T.R. 541. for this impious proceeding, thrown in pieces of uncoined metal. That this temple was pillaged, all writers agree. But Cœlius afferts, that Hannibal, in his march towards Rome, turned aside thither from Eretum; and he traces his route through Amiternum, Cutilii, and Reate; alleging, that, from Campania, he came into Samnium, thence into Pelignia; then, passing near the town of Sukno, proceeded into the territory of the Marrucinians. thence through the lands of Alba into Marsia, and fo on to Amiternum, and the village of Foruli. Nor is this diversity of opinion owing to people's having lost, within so short a period, a distinct remembrance of the traces of fo great an army: for, that he went in that track, is certain; the only matter in doubt is, whether he took this route in advancing towards Rome, or in his return thence to Campania.

> XII. But Hannibal shewed not such obstinate perseverance in his endeavours to raise the siege of Capua, as the Romans did in pushing it forward: for, from Lucania, he hastened away into Bruttium, and all the way to the very strait and the city of Rhegium, with fuch speed, that in consequence of his fudden arrival he was very near taking that place by furprife. Capua. though the vigour of the fiere had not in the mean-time been at all relaxed, yet felt the return of Flaccus; and it was matter of great wonder to the befieged, that Hannibal had not come back at the same time. But, in discoursing with fome of the beliegers, they foon learned, that they were left to themselves and abandoned; and that the Carthaginians confidered the hope of maintaining polfession of Capua as desperate. This afflicting intelligence was followed by an edict of the proconful, published by direction of the fenate, and spred among

OF ROME.

that "any native of Campania who Be come over before a certain day should be XI "intermified for all that was past." But not one Y. embraced the offer, though they were not restrained B.C by fidelity to their affociates, so much so by their ferm, because at the time of their revolting they had committed crimes too enormous, as they supposed, to be forgiven. However, though none of them were led to defert by a regard to private interest, yet neither was any proper care taken to promote the interest of the public. The nobility had renamed all public business, and could not be compelled to meet in the senate; and he who was in the office of chief magistrate, was a man who had not, from thence, derived any honour on himself, but had, from his own worthlessness, stripped the office of its weight and authority. Not one of the nobles even appeared in the Forum, or in any public place; but kept themselves shut up in their houses, in daily expectation of the downfall of their city, and the ruin of their country, together with their own destruction. The administration of all business had devolved on Bostar and Hanno, the commanders of the Carthaginian garrison, the chief object of whose concern was, their own danger, not that of their allies. These men wrote to Hannibal in terms not wy free, but harsh, charging him, that "besides furrendering Capua into the hands of the enemy, had abandoned them and their garrison to the gazard of all kinds of torture: that he had gone to Bruttium as if on purpose to be out of the way, lest the city should be taken in his sight. This was not like the conduct of the Romans, whom not even an attack on the city of Rome could draw away from the siege of Capua: so much more fleady were Romans in enmity, than Carthaginians in friendship." They told him, if he would return to Capua, and bring his in Thole force thither, both they and the Campanians " would B B

BOOK "would be ready to fally forth to his affiftance. "They had not croffed the Alps for the purpose of KKVI. waging war with the people of Rhegium, or of Y.B. 41. "Tarentum: wherever the Roman legions were, there ought likewise to be the Carthaginian " armies. In this manner fucces had been obtained " at Cannæ; in this manner at the Trafimenus; by " uniting, by keeping their camp close to that of " the enemy, by making trial of fortune." Having written a letter to this effect, they gave it to some Numidians, who had before promifed their fervice for a reward agreed on. After these had come into the camp to Flaccus as deferters, intending to watch for an opportunity of proceeding thence, (the famine which had raged fo long in Capua affording any one a colourable pretence for deferting,) a Campanian woman, who had been mistress to one of these, came unexpectedly into the camp, and informed the Roman general that the Numidians had come over with a treacherous defign, and were carrying a letter to Hannibal; and that of this she was ready to convict one of them, who had disclosed the matter to her. On being brought to an examination, he at first maintained firmly that he did not know the woman; but afterwards, yielding reluctantly to the force of truth, on leeing that the racks were called for and brought out, he confessed the fact. The letter was produced, and a farther discovery made of a matter not hiherto mentioned, that feveral other Numidians, under the appearance of deferters, were stroking about in the Roman camp. These, in number about feventy, were apprehended, and, together with the

XIII. The fight of a punishment so grievous quite broke the spirits of the Campanians. The populace, crowding about the senate-house, and pelled Lesius to call a meeting of the senate, and openly late deserters, beaten with rods; their hands were then cut off, and they were driven back to Capua.

proposed sending ambassadors to the Roman gene-past, had absented the mobles, who, for a long time BOOK past, had absented themselves from public assemblies, that, if they did not attend the meeting, they would go round to each of their houses, and drag them out by force. The fear of this procured the magistrate a full senate. At this meeting, while the rest rals, Vibius Virius, who had been the principal promoter of the revolt from the Romans, on being asked his opinion, faid, that "those who spoke of " fending ambaffadors, and of peace, and a lurrender, did not confider either what they themselves would do, it they had the Romans in their power, " or what they must expect to suffer from them. "What!" faid he, "do you imagine that your fur-" render now will be of the same kind with that, "whereby, in order to obtain support against the "Samnites, we delivered ourselves and all belonging to us into the hands of the Romans? Have " you already forgotten at what feafon and in what " circumstances, we revolted from the Romans? 66 Have you already forgotten how, at the time of 66 this revolt, we put to death, with indignity and 66 torture, their garrison, which might have been "dismissed? How often, and with what bitter anies mosity, we have fallied out against them, since they began the fiege; and even attacked their 's camp? That we invited Hannibal, in hopes of caushing them; and that we lately sent him hence to attack the city of Rome? Recollect, on the "other hand, the instances of their animosity 45 against us; that you may, from thence, be able " to estimate what room there is for hope. When " there was a foreign enemy in Italy, and that enemy was Hannibal; when war blazed in every quarter, they, neglecting every other concern, seglecting Hannibal himself, sent both their conshals with two consular armies to attack Capua. "These two years they have kept us shut up, BOOK "furrounded with trenches, and confuming us by

XXVI. " famine; although they themselves, together with " us, undergo the extremest dangers, and the se-Y.R. 541. " verest labours; often losing many at their rampart " and trenches, and, at last, being nearly beaten " out of their camp. But I will not enlarge upon "these matters. To endure toils and hardships in " attacking an enemy's city, is no new thing; it is " usual. What I am going to mention, affords a " proof of refentment and implacable hatred: Han-" nibal, with a powerful army of horse and foot, " affaulted their camp, and got poffession of a part " of it. The greatness of their danger did not, " in the least, dispose them to drop the siege. " Croffing the Vulturnus, he laid waste the territory " of Cales with fire: fuch a fevere calamity of their " allies called them not away. He ordered his " troops to march in hostile array to the city of "Rome itself: this storm, ready to burst on their " heads, they likewife flighted. Paffing the Anio, " he encamped within three miles of Rome, and at " last advanced to the very walls and gates, shewing " a determination to deprive them of their city, " unless they quitted Capua. They did not quit it. "Wild beafts, inflamed with blind fury and rage, " you may draw away to the affistance of their " young, if you go up to their dens and cubs. As " to the Romans, not the blockade of Rome, nor " their wives and children, whose lamentations might " almost be heard even here, not their altars, their " houses, the temples of their gods, and the se-" pulchres of their ancestors profaned and violated, " could draw them away from Capua; fo keen are "their wishes to bring us to punishment, so eager "their thirst for our blood. And, perhaps, mot 66 without reason: for we, on our parts, would " have done the fame, had fortune given us the " power. Wherefore, fince the immortal gods have " determined otherwise, and though I ought not to decline death; yet while I am free, while I BOOK " am master of myself, I can, by a death both XXVI. 66 honourable and easy, avoid the tortures and in- Y.R.547. dignities which the enemy hopes to inflict on me. B.C. 211. "Never will I see Appius Claudius and Quintus "Fulvius puffed up with the infolence of victory; " nor will I be dragged in chains through the city " of Rome, as a spectacle in their triumph, that I " may afterwards, either in a dungeon or tied to a fake, have my back mangled with stripes, and " Submit my neck to a Roman axe; never will I " fee my native city demolished, and reduced to " ashes, nor the Campanian matrons and virgins 66 dragged to violation. Alba, from whence they 66 themselves sprung, they rased from the founda-66 tion, that no monument of their extraction or origin might exist. Can I believe that they will " spare Capua, against which they are more vio-66 lently incenfed than against Carthage? Whoso-" ever of you, then, are disposed to yield to destiny, 66 before they become spectators of so many scenes " of fuch horrid kinds, for these a banquet is pre-66 pared and ready, this day, at my house. When 46 you shall have indulged plentifully in food and wine, the same cup that will be given to me shall 66 go round. That cup will fave our bodies from "torture, our minds from infult, our eyes and ears from the fight and hearing of all the cruelties " and indignities that await the conquered. "will be persons in readiness to throw our lifeless " bodies on a large pile kindled in the court-yard ", of the house. This way alone conducts us to "death with honour and freedom. Our enemies "themselves will admire our courage, and Hanni-" bal will be convinced, that the allies, whom he 46 deferted and betrayed, were men of determined " valour."

XXVI. ii Y.R 541 h

XIV. More approved of the proposal contained in this speech of Vibius, than had resolution to adopt it. The greater part of the fenate, conceiving hopes that the clemency of the Roman people, often experienced in former disputes, might be extended even to their case, after passing a decree for that purpose, sent ambassadors to surrender Capua to the Romans. About twenty-seven senators followed Vibius Virius to his house; where, after feasting with him, and, as far as they could, banishing from their minds, by wine, all feeling of the impending evil, they every one took the poison. They then broke up the meeting, gave their hands, took the last embrace, condoling with one another on their own fall, and that of their country. Some remained there, in order to be burned together on one pile, and the rest retired to their several houses. Their veins were filled by the victuals and wine; which circumstance retarded the efficacy of the poison in hastening death, so that most of them lingered through that whole night, and part of the next day; however, they all expired before the gates were opened to the enemy. On the day following, the gate of Jupiter, which was opposite to the Roman camp, was opened by order of the proconful, and through it marched in one legion, and two confederate squadrons, under the command of Caius Fulvius, lieutenant-general. His first care was, to have all the arms and weapons in the city brought to him; then, placing guards at all the gates, to prevent any one going or being conveyed out, he lecured the Carthaginian garrison, and ordered the Campanian fenators to go into the camp to the Roman generals. On their arrival there, they were all immediately thrown into chains, and ordered to furnish the quailtors with an account of what gold and filver they The gold amounted to feventy pounds weight, the filver to three thousand two hundred. Of the senators, twenty-five were sent to Cales, and twentytwenty-eight to Teanum, to be kept in custody. BOOK These were the persons who appeared to have been XXVI. chiefly instrumental in bringing about the revolt from Y.R.541. the Romans.

XV. With respect to the punishment of the Campanian fenate, Fulvius and Claudius could by no means agree. Claudius was inclined to favour their fuit for pardon; the opinion of Fulvius was more fevere. Appius, therefore, proposed, that the entire determination of that matter should be removed to Rome; observing, that it was highly reafonable that the fenate should have an opportunity of inquiring, whether they had brought any of the Latine confederates, or of the municipal towns, to take part in their defigns, and whether they had been affished by them in the war. Fulvius insisted. that "it would be to the last degree improper, that 46 faithful allies should have their minds disturbed " by dubious imputations, and be subjected to in-"formers, who never scruple either what they say 66 or do. Any inquiry of that kind, therefore, he was resolved to suppress and stifle." After this conversation they parted; and Applus made no doubt that his colleague, though he fpoke in this determined manner, would yet, in a case of such importance, wait for letters from Rome. But Fulvius. apprehensive that his intention might be frustrated by that very means, difmissed the officers attending at his pavilion, and ordered the military tribunes and præfects of the allies to give notice to two thousand chosen horsemen, to be in readiness at the third trumpet. With this body of horse he set out in the night for Teanum, and entering the gate at the first light, proceeded straight to the Forum. The arrival of the horsemen having caused immediately a concourse of the people, he ordered the Sidicinian magistrate to be summoned, and commanded him to bring forth the Campanians whom he

BOOK had in his custody. Accordingly they were all brought forth, beaten with rods, and beheaded. From thence, he rode away at full fpeed to Cales; B.C. 211. where, when he had taken his feat on the tribunal, and the lictors were binding the Campanians to the stakes, a courier, arriving in haste from Rome, delivered him a letter from Caius Calpurnius, the prætor, and a decree of the fenate in their favour. murmur immediately spread from the tribunal through the whole affembly, that the case of the Campanians was referved for the cognizance of the fenate. Fulvius, suspecting this to be so, when he received the letter, thrust it unopened into his bosom, and commanded the crier to order the lictor to proceed in his duty according to law. Thus those also who were at Cales suffered punishment. He then read the letter and the decree, when it could not obstruct the business already finished, and which had been hurried on lest it might be obstructed. When Fulvius was rifing from his feat, Taurea Jubellius, a Campanian, making his way through the middle of the city and of the crowd, called on him by name. Fulvius, wondering what his business with him might be, resumed his seat; on which the other faid, "Order me also to be put " to death, that you may boast of having killed -" a braver man than yourfelf." Fulvius faid, that "the man had certainly loft his reason," and observed besides, that "if he were inclined to " comply with his defire, he was now restrained " by a decree of the fenate." Jubellius on this exclaimed: "Since, after feeing my country re-"duced to captivity, after losing my friends and " relations, after having killed, with my own hand, " my wife and children, to prevent their fuffering " any indignity, I am denied even the means of "dying in the fame manner with these my country-" men; let me feek from my own resolution asde-" liverance from this detefted life;" and then stabbing himself through the breast, with a sword which BOOK he had concealed under his garment, he fell lifeless XXVI. at the general's feet.

Y.R.541. B.C. 211.

XVI. Because not only the whole business relative to the punishment of the Campanians, but, also, most of the other transactions, in that quarter, were conducted agreeably to the fingle judgment of Flaccus, fome writers affirm, that Appius Claudius died before the furrender of Capua. They fay, too, that this same Taurea neither came voluntarily to Cales, nor died by his own hand; but that, while he was, among the rest, tied to a stake, and because the expressions which he loudly vociferated could not be well heard, amidst the noise of the crowd, Flaccus had ordered filence to be made, and that then Taurea uttered the words before-mentioned: that "he, a man of confummate valour, was to be put to 66 death by one his inferior in courage!" that, on his faying this, the crier, by order of the proconful, pronounced aloud this order, "Lictor, apply the rods to this man of valour, and on him first * execute the law." Some writers affert also, that he read the decree of the senate before he beheaded the prisoners; but because there was an expression annexed, that "if he judged proper, he fhould refer the business entire to the senate," he interpreted this as giving him authority to determine what he judged most conducive to the public good. From Cales he returned to Capua, and received the fubmission of Atella and Calatia. In these towns alfo, the persons who had been in the management of affairs, were punished. Upon the whole, eighty of the principal members of the senate were put to death, and about three hundred Campanian nobles were thrown into prison. The rest, being fent into several of the cities of the Latine confederates to be kept in custody, perished by various The whole remaining multitude of Campanian BOOK panian citizens were ordered to be fold. How to

Y.R.541. dispose of the town and its territory remained to be considered: and here, many were of opinion, that a B.C.211. city, so hostile in disposition, so near the Roman borders, and fo formidably powerful, ought to be demolished. However, the consideration of immediate utility prevailed; and, on account of the foil, which was well known to be endued with a fertility qualifying it for every kind of cultivation, and beyond any other in Italy, the city was preferved, to be a kind of fettlement of husbandmen. For the purpose of peopling the same, all those of its former inhabitants, who had not become citizens, together with the freedmen, dealers, and tradefmen, were ordered to remain; the land and public buildings became the property of the Roman people. It was, however, determined, that Capua should have no other privilege of a city, than the being inhabited; no fystem of civil polity, no assembly of a fenate or commons, no magistrates. For it was supposed that a multitude, without a public council, without a ruling head, participating in no common rights, would be incapable of forming defigns in concert. It was further ordained, that the administration of justice should be conducted by a præfect, to be fent yearly from Rome. In this manner were the affairs of Capua adjusted, with a policy in every particular commendable. Severe and speedy punishment was inflicted on the most guilty; the populace were dispersed beyond all hope of return; but no passionate resentment was vented, in fire and devastation, on the unoffending houses and walls. There was impressed on the minds of all the allies, an advantageous opinion of Roman clemency in the fparing of this very celebrated and opulent city, the demolition of which would have deeply afflicted, not only all Campania, but every state in its neighbourhood. This conduct extorted also from the enemy a full acknowledgment of the power of the Romans to punish faithless allies; while they were convinced BOOK how utterly inadequate the ability of Hannibal was to XXVI. afford them the protection engaged for.

OF ROME.

Y.R.541. B.C. 211.

XVII. The attention of the fenate being no longer necessary to the business of Capua, they decreed to Claudius Nero fix thousand foot and three hundred horse, to be chosen by himself out of those two legions which he had commanded at that place; with a like number of foot, and eight hundred horse of the confederate Latines. This army he embarked at Puteoli, and carried over to Spain. When the fleet arrived at Tarraco, he difembarked the troops, hauled the ships on shore, and, to augment his numbers, armed the marines; then, marching to the river Iberus, and receiving the forces then with Titus Fonteius and Lucius Marcius, he proceeded towards the enemy. Hafdrubal, fon of Hamilcar, was at this time encamped in Ausetania, at a place called the Black Stones, between the towns of Illeturge and Metiffa-a valley furrounded by hills and woods, the entrances to which were feized by Nero. order to extricate himself, Hasdrubal sent a messenger with the wand of peace, engaging that, if he were allowed to depart, he would entirely evacuate Spain. This proposal the Roman received with joy. Carthaginians then requested, that a conference might be held in order to fettle, in writing, the rules to be observed respecting the surrender of the citadels of the feveral towns, and the appointment of a day whereon the garrifons were to be withdrawn, removing, without obstruction, every thing that belonged This request being complied with, Hafto them. drubal gave orders, that as foon as it should begin to grow dark, the part of his army least calculated for expeditious movements should get out of the defile as they were able: particular care, however, was taken that great numbers should not leave it at once, because a few were more likely both to

¥.R.541. B.C.211.

BOOK pass in silence, and unobserved by the enemy, and also to make their way through the narrow and difficult paths. Next day the commanders of it met; but the whole of it was purposely wasted by Hasdrubal in speaking and writing abundance of things perfectly immaterial; and, confequently, the conference was postponed to the next. He thus gained the fpace of the following night also, to send out more of his troops, and, even the next day, did not conclude the bufinefs. In this manner feveral days were passed in openly debating on the conditions, and the nights in privately fending off the Carthaginians; fo that, when the greater part of his troops had got clear, his fincerity decreafing along with his fears, he refused to abide by what he himself had proposed. And now, almost the whole of the infantry had made their way out of the defile, when, at the dawn of day, a thick fog overspread both that and all the adjacent plains; which Hasdrubal perceiving, sent to Nero to defer the conference until the next morning, alleging, that this was a day on which the Carthaginians were prohibited by their religion from transacting any ferious business. Even this raised no fuspicion of deceit. Hasdrubal, having obtained the indulgence he had demanded, instantly quitted the camp with his cavalry and elephants; and, without caufing any alarm, gained a place of fafety. About the fourth hour, the fog being dispersed by the sun, the day cleared up, and shewed to the Romans the enemy's deserted camp. Then, at last, Nero became acquainted with Carthaginian perfidy, and was fo provoked at having thus been duped, that he fet out directly in pursuit of the retreating enemy, determined to bring him to an engagement; but the other eluded all his endeavours. Some skirmishes however took place between the rear of the Carthaginians and the advanced guard of the Romans.

XVIII. Meanwhile those Spanish states, which, BOOK after the late disaster, had abandoned the cause of XXVI. the Romans, did not return to their alliance, but no Y.R.541. others had lately deferted them. At Rome, fince B.C. att. the recovery of Capua, the fenate and people gave not more earnest attention to the affairs of Italy, than to those of Spain; they therefore determined to augment the army there, and to fend a general to command it. But it was not so easy to agree on the person to be sent, as it was to perceive that extraordinary care ought to be employed in the choice of one to be commissioned to such a charge, in which two most eminent commanders had fallen within the space of thirty days, and where he was to fupply the place of the two. Some named one, fome another, until the resolution was at last adopted of leaving it to the people in affembly, to elect a proconful for Spain; and the confuls accordingly proclaimed a day for the election. It had been expected, at first, that those who believed themselves qualified for fuch an important command, would become candidates; and the failure of this expectation renewed the affliction of the public, for the fevere blow which they had fustained, and for the generals whom they had loft. Under this dejection of mind, almost incapable of forming a judgment on the state of things, the people, nevertheless, on the day of election, repaired to the field of Mars. where they fixed their eyes on the magistrates. watching the countenances of the feveral men of the greatest eminence, who only cast looks of perplexity one on another. And now, every one began with added forrow to remark, that their affairs were hopeless, and the cause of the public so desperate that no one dared to accept the command in Spain; when on a fudden, Publius Cornelius Scipio, a fon of Publius, who was killed in Spain, being then about the age of twenty-four, went up to an emi-

BOOK nence, from whence he could be feen, and declared XXVI. himself a candidate. The eyes of the whole affects. Y.R.541. bly were instantly turned on him, and universal ac-B.C. 211 clamations testified hopes and presages of prosperity and fuccess to his commission. Orders were given, that they should immediately proceed to give their fuffrages, when not only every century, wkhout exception, but every individual, voted, that Publius Scipio should have the command in Spain. When the business was finished, and the vehemence and ardour of their emotions had subsided, a sudden filence ensued; and they now began to reflect on the strange manner in which they had acted, governing themselves rather by partial inclination, than by judgment. His early age was the princi-pal cause of their uneafiness: while some at the fame time conceived terrible apprehensions from the fortune attending his house, and even from his name. The two families he belonged to were then mourning; and he was to fet out for a province where he must carry on his operations between the tombs of his father and of his uncle.

> XIX. When he perceived that, after going through the business with such great alacrity of zeal, the people were yet impressed with solicitude and anxiety. he fummoned an affembly; and there enlarged on the subject of his years, on the command entrusted to him, and the war to be carried on; and this he did with fuch magnanimity and elevation of fentiment, as to rekindle and renew the ardour which had fubfided, and to fill the people with greater confidence than either the faith reposed in any human professions, or than reason, judging from the most promising state of affairs, usually supplies. For Scipio was deferving of admiration, not only for real virtues, but also for a certain judicious method of displaying them to advantage, to which he had 12 been trained from his youth. He generally represented BOOK any matter, which he wished to carry with the multitude, as recommended either by a vision in the Y.R.541. night, or by an admonition impressed on his mind B.C.211. by the gods; whether owing to the influence of some kind of superstition in him, or with the design of bringing men to execute his orders and schemes without hesitation, as if they were directed by the responses of an oracle. To prepare their minds for this, he never transacted any business, public or private (from the very moment of assuming the manly gown), without first going to the Capitol, walking into the temple, and fitting there for some time; generally alone, and in some retired spot. This custom, which was observed by him through the whole course of his life, made several people rive credit to a notion which was then propamated either by his own contrivance or by fome aknown author, that he was of divine extraction; the to the fable formerly told of Alexander the Great. The fiction went, that he was begotten by a huge ferpent; in which form the prodigy, it was . faid, had been very often feen in his mother's chamber, and on people's coming in, glided away fuddenly, and disappeared. These miraculous stories he himfelf never discouraged, but rather artfully countenanced, neither contradicting any thing of the kind, nor absolutely affirming it. Many other remarkable incidents in respect of this youth (some real, and others fictitious,) had procured for him a degree of admiration furpassing what was due to any human being; and these were the motives which then induced the public to intrust him, at so unripe an age, with the conduct of fo momentous a business as that to which he had aspired. To the remains of the whole army, still in Spain, and the forces carried thither from Puteoli with Claudius Nero, were added ten thousand foot, and one thousand

Y.R.541.

BOOK thousand horse; and Marcus Junius Silanus, proprestor, was fent with him, to affift in the management of affairs. Thus fetting fail from Oftia, on the Tiber, B.C. 211. with a fleet of thirty ships, which were all quinter remes, and coasting along the shore of the Tuscan sea. the Alps, and the Gallic gulph; and then doubling the promontory of Pyrene, he disembarked his forces at Emporium, a city of Greeks, who came originally from Phocæa. Thence, having ordered the fleet to follow, he marched by land to Tarraco, and there held a convention of all the allies; for, on the news of his arrival, embassies had poured in from every state in the province. Here he ordered the ships to be laid up on shore, after sending back four triremes of the Massilians, which had, out of respective accompanied him from home. He then applied himself to giving answers to the embassies of feveral states, whose minds had been held in penfe by the fuccession of so many various events and this he performed with much dignity of spin refulting from a thorough confidence in his of abilities; but at the same time, not one presunting tuous word fell from him, and, in every thing which he faid, there appeared at once the greatest elevation of fentiment, and the greatest candour.

> XX. Leaving Tarraco, he visited the several states of the allies, and the winter-quarters of the army. Here he bestowed much praise on the foldiers, for having, after all their fufferings, in two fuch dreadful difasters succeeding one another, still retained possession of the province, not allowing the enemy to derive any advantage from their fuccefs, but excluding them entirely from the country on the hither fide of the lberus, and honourably fecuring the fafety of the Allies. Marcius he west near himself, and treated with him upon terms to highly honourable as plainly demonstrated, that he feared nothing less, than that any one might eclipse BOOK his own glory. Silanus then fucceeded in the room XXVI. of Nero, and the troops lately arrived went into Y.R.542. winter quarters. Scipio having, without loss of B.C. 211. time, repaired to the places where his presence was requifite, and finished the business there to be done, returned to Tarraco. The enemy were, by this time, possessed with an opinion of Scipio not inferior to that entertained by his own countrymen and the allies; and they felt, moreover, a kind of foreboding of what was to come, which (the less able they were to account for apprehensions of which no cause appeared) impressed the greater dread upon their minds. They had gone into winter quarters in different parts of the country: Hasdrubal, son of Gilgo, at Gades, on the ocean; Mago in the inland parts, the greatest part of his troops being stationed above the pass of Castulo; and Hasdrubal, son of Hamilcar, in the neighbourhood of Saguntum, on the banks of the Iberus. Towards the end of that fummer wherein Capua was taken, and Scipio came into Spain, a Carthaginian fleet, which was called over from Sicily to Tarentum to cut off the supplies of the Roman garrison in the citadel, shut up, indeed, every access to it by sea; but, by lying there too long, caufed a greater fearcity among their friends than among the enemy: for the quantity of corn that could be brought into the town along the coasts, which were kept in awe, and through the ports, which were kept open by the power of the Carthaginian fleet, was not equal to the confumption of the fleet itself, crowded as it was with a mixed multitude of people of every description; and while the garrison of the citadel, being few in number, could support themselves out of the magazines previously formed without any importation, all that could be brought in was too little to answer the demands of the Tarentines and the fleet.

BOOK last the fleet was sent away, which gave greater fatisfaction than its coming had done, but produced very little relief to the scarcity; for when the naval force was removed, no more corn could be brought in.

XXI. Towards the close of this fummer, Marcus Marcellus having returned to Rome from his province of Sicily, the prætor, Caius Calpurnius, affembled the fenate in the temple of Bellona, to give him audience. Here, after expatiating on the fervices which he had performed, and complaining in mild terms, not more on his own account than on that of his foldiers, that though he had completed all the business of the province, he had not been allowed to bring home the army, he requested permission to enter the city in triumph. This occafioned a long debate, wherein it was urged on one fide, that after they had in his absence decreed a fupplication and a thanksgiving to the immortal gods in his behalf, and for fervices happily accomplished, the refusing him a triumph when he appeared to demand it, would imply an inconfiftency; and, on the other, that, as they had decreed that he should give up the command of the army to a fuccessor (which kind of decree was never passed, unless when war still subsisted in the province), there would be no less inconsistency in voting him a triumph, as if the war were concluded, and while the troops, who could best testify whether he merited that honour or not, were in a distant country. The matter was at length compromifed, with a decree that he should enter the city in ovation. The plebeian tribunes, by direction of the fenate, proposed to the people the iffuing of an order, that Marcus Marcellus should enjoy the authority of a general during the day on which he should pass through Rome in ovation. the day preceding that of his entrance, he triumphed on the Alban mount; and, in his ovation, had great BOOK abundance of spoils borne before him into the city. XXVI. Together with a model, representing the captured city of Syracuse, were carried in procession the catapultas, B.C. 211. baliftas, and every other kind of engine used in Likewise, the valuable ornaments collected by their kings, at vast expence, during a long continuance of peace; abundance of wrought filver and brass furniture of various kinds, precious garments, and a great number of remarkably fine statues, with which kind of ornaments Syracuse had abounded as much as any of the Grecian cities. Eight elephants were also led in his train, as an emblem of his victory over the Carthaginians; and what formed not the least attractive part of the show, he was preceded by Sofis the Syracufan, and Mericus the Spamard, with crowns of gold on their heads; the former of whom had guided the Romans into Syracuse by night, the other had delivered the island and its garrison into their hands. To both of these the freedom of the state was granted, and to each five hundred acres of land. The portion intended for Sofis was ordered to be given to him in the territory of Syracuse, out of the estates which had belonged either to the kings or to the enemies of the Roman people, with any house that he should choose of those which had belonged to persons punished according to the laws of war. Mericus, and the Spaniards who came over with him, were to have a city and lands allotted to them, in fome of those parts of Sicily which had revolted from the Romans: and Marcus Cornelius was commissioned to assign these to them wherever he should judge proper. hundred acres of land in the fame country were decreed to Belligenes, by whose perfuations Mericus had been prevailed on to feeede from the Carthag nians over to the Romans. After the departure of Marcellus from Sicily, a Carthaginian fleet landed eight. CC2

B.R.541. Y.C.211.

BOOK eight thousand foot and three thousand Numidian horse, who were soon joined by the Murgantians, and their revolt was followed by that of Hybla, and feveral other cities of less note. The Numidians, headed by Mutines, making excursions through every part of the island, wasted with fire and sword the lands of those who were in alliance with Rome. Besides these untoward circumstances, the Roman troops, being incenfed partly because they had not been carried home with their commander, and partly because they had been forbidden to winter in towns, became very remiss in their duty, and wanted rather a leader than inclination for a mutiny. In the midst of these difficulties, the prætor, Marcus Cornelius, by fometimes foothing, fometimes reproving the foldiers, brought them to a calmer temper, and also reduced to submission all the states which had revolted; out of which he affigned Murgantia to those Spaniards who were intitled to a city and lands by the fenate's decree.

> XXII. As both the confuls were employed in the one province of Apulia, and as the danger to be apprehended from Hannibal and the Carthaginians was not diminished, they were ordered to cast lots for Apulia and Macedonia as their provinces. Macedonia fell to Sulpicius, and he succeeded in the room of Lævinus. Fulvius was called to Rome to preside at the elections; and, holding an assembly, the younger Veturian century, being the first to vote, named Titus Manlius Torquatus, and Titus Otacilius, consuls. Manlius being present, a crowd gathered around him to offer their congratulations, there being no doubt of the concurrence of the people. Surrounded as he was by a vast multitude, went up to the conful's tribunal, requesting permilion to fay a few words, and that the century which had voted might be called back. After the affembly affembly had waited fome time with impatience, to BOOK know what he intended to require, he excused him. XXVI. felf from accepting the office, on account of the Y.R.541. weakness of his eyes, observing, that "it would be B.C. 211. 66 shameless presumption in a pilot, or a general, "who was obliged to transact his own proper busi-" ness by the help of other people's eyes, to expect "that the lives and fortunes of men should be com-" mitted to his charge. Wherefore, he requested "the conful to order the younger Veturian century "to be called back to vote anew, and to recollect, " while they were electing confuls, the war that " fubfifted in Italy, with the present exigencies of "the commonwealth; and that people's ears were 66 scarcely yet relieved from the noise and tumult " raifed by the enemy, when a few months ago they " lay close to the walls of Rome." Here he was interrupted by the century, who one and all cried out that they would not alter their vote. Torquatus then replied, "Should I become conful, neither shall "I be able to endure your behaviour, nor you my "government: go back, then, and vote again, " and confider that there is a Carthaginian war fub-" fifting in Italy, and that the leader of your ene-" mies is Hannibal." The century then, moved by the authority of the man, and the murmurs of admiration expressed by all around, befought Titus to fummon the elder Veturian century, as they wished to confer with persons older than themselves, and to be directed by them in their choice of confuls. The elder Veturian century was accordingly fummoned, and time was allowed for the others to confer with them, apart from the crowd, in the inclosure of the voters. The elders said, that there were three proper objects for their confideration, two of whom had already passed through a full course of public honours, Quintus Fabius, and Marcus Marcellus; that if they had a particular wish to elect a conful, yet untried, against the Cartha-CC 3 ginians,

BOOK ginians, there was Marcus Valerius Lævinus, who XXVI. had conducted the war against King Philip, both on land and fea, with extraordinary fuccess. They Y.R.211 accordingly confulted together respecting those three, and the elders being difmiffed, the younger century proceeded to vote. They named as confuls Marcus Claudius Marcellus, whose character then shone in full fplendour, in confequence of his glorious conquest of Sicily, and Marcus Valerius, both absent; and were followed by all the rest of the centuries. Men may ridicule the admirers of ancient times, but I shall ever remain perfuaded, that even though there should exist a republic of philosophers, such as speculative men are fond of forming in imagination, but which never was known, yet there could not be produced either a nobility of more folid judgment, and of more unambitious tempers, nor a populace guided by founder moral principles, than were these of whom I speak. That a century of young men should wish to consult their elders on the choice of a person to whom they were to entrust the government by their vote, appears indeed at present scarcely credible; but it is because, in the fashion of this age, even sons slight and difregard the counsel of their parents.

> XXIII. They then proceeded to the election of prætors, and Publius Manlius Volfo, Lucius Manlius Acidinus, Caius Lætorius, and Lucius Cincius Alimentus, were chosen. It happened that, just as the elections were finished, an account arrived that Titus Otacilius, whom the people would probably have appointed conful, in his absence, together with Titus Manlius, if the course of the election had not been interrupted, had died in Sicily. The games of Apollo had been celebrated the year before, and, on the proposal of the prætor, Calpurnius, that they should be performed this year also, a decree was made by the fenate, that they should be celebrated annually annually for ever. This year feveral prodigies were BOOK feen and reported. At the temple of Concord, a XXVI. statue of Victory, which stood on the summit of the Y.R. 541. roof, being struck by lightning, and shaken at its B.C.211. base, fell and stuck among the ensigns of the goddess which were on the pediment. From Anagnia and Fregella reports were brought, that a wall and fome gates were by the like means thrown down; that, in the Forum of Sudertum, streams of blood ran for a whole day; that a shower of stones fell at Eretum, and that at Reate a mule had produced a foal. These prodigies were expiated with the greater victims; the people were ordered to perform a supplication, of one day's continuance, to avert the wrath of the gods, and the nine days festival was folemnized. Several of the public priefts died this year, and new ones were appointed in their places. In the room of Marcus Æmilius Numida, decemvir of religious affairs, was substituted Marcus Æmilius Lepidus; in the room of Marcus Pomponius Matho. pontiff, Caius Livius; and in the room of Spurius Carvilius Maximus, augur, Marcus Servilius. Because Titus Otacilius Crassus, who was a pontiff, died after the conclusion of the year, there was no nomination of any person to his place. Caius Claudius, flamen of Jupiter, because he had committed fome irregularity in the distribution of the entrails, refigned the office.

XXIV. About this time Marcus Valerius Lævinus, after having first sounded the dispositions of the principal men in secret conferences, came with some light ships to a council of the Ætolians, which had been previously summoned for this purpose. Here, convince them of the flourishing state of the affairs of Italy and Sicily, he expatiated in high terms on the reduction of Capua, and of Syracuse, adding, that "the Romans inherited, even from their earliest ancestors, a constant disposition to study the inte-

" reft

BOOK XXVI.

" rest of their allies; some of whom they had admitted into their state to equal privileges with " " themselves, and others were supported by them in Y R.541. " fuch fituations, that they chose rather to be allies, B.C. 211. "than fellow-citizens. That the Ætolians would " be held by them in the higher degree of estima-" tion, on account that they would be the first, of " all the nations separated from them by the sea, " who united with them in friendship. That Philip " and the Macedonians were troublesome neigh-" bours; but that he had already broken their " ftrength and spirits, and was determined to reduce "them fo low, that they should not only evacuate "those cities, of which they had forcibly deprived " the Ætolians, but should find Macedonia itself an " uneafy residence. As to the Acarnanians, whose " difmemberment from their body gave the Ætolians " much concern, he engaged to replace them under "the former charter of obedience to their authority "and jurifdiction." These affertions and promises of the Roman general, Scopas, who was then prætor of the nation, and Dorimachus, a principal man among the Ætolians, confirmed by their own authority; and therefore, with the less referve, and greater affurance of gaining belief, extolled the power and exalted reputation of the Roman people. However, that which had the greatest influence was the hope of recovering Acarnania. The particulars were accordingly reduced to writing, on which they were to join in a treaty of alliance and friendship with the Roman people, and a clause was added, that "if it was agreeable to their own wish, the Eleans and Lace-" dæmonians should be included on the same terms " of friendship, and also Attalus, Pleuratus, and "Scerdilædus." Attalus was king of Afia, others of Thrace and Illyria. The terms of the treaty were, that "the Ætolians should immediately com-" mence war against Philip on land: that the Romans " fhould affift them with not less than twenty ships

" of five banks of oars: that, of all the cities that BOOK " fhould be taken as far as Corcyra, beginning XXVI. " from Ætolia, the buildings of every description, Y.R.541. " together with the lands thereunto belonging, B.C. 211. " should be the property of the Ætolians; all other " booty of what kind soever to be given up to the "Romans: that the Romans should use their en-"deavours to fecure to the Ætolians the possession " of Acamania: that, if the Ætolians should make " peace with Philip, an article shouldbe inserted in the treaty, declaring it valid, only on condi-"tion that Philip should refrain from committing " hostilities on the Romans, their allies, or any " under their dominion: in like manner, if the Ro-"man people should form an alliance with the king, "that they should take care not to allow him a right " of making war on the Ætolians and their allies." Such was the purport of the negociation entered into by the above-named powers, two copies of which were made two years after, and deposited, one, by the Romans, in the Capitol, and the other by the Ætolians, at Olympia, that these consecrated records might bear evidence of its contents. This delay arose from the Ætolian ambassadors having been too long detained at Rome, which however was no impediment to the business of the war; for the Ætolians immediately commenced hostilities against Philip, while Lævinus attacked Zacynthus, a small island near the coast of Ætolia, which has one city of the fame name with itself. This, excepting the citadel, he reduced by storm, and taking from the Acarnanians Æniadæ and Nasus, put them into the hands of the Ætolians. Judging that Philip was now fufficiently embroiled in war with his neighbours to prevent his thinking of Italy, the Carthaginians, and his compact with Hannibal, he retired to Corcyra.

XXV. Philip received the account of the defection of the Ætolians at Pella, where he had fixed his

Y.R.541.

BOOK his residence for the winter. As he was to move XXVI. his army into Greece in the beginning of the next fpring, he determined to strike terror into the Illy-B.C. 211, rians, and the cities in that quarter, in return for the alarms which they had caused to him, so that they should leave Macedonia unmolested during his absence; accordingly, he undertook a sudden expedition against the territories of Oricum and Apollonia. The Apollonians who came out to meet him he compelled to fly with difmay into their city; then, after ravaging the frontiers of Illyricum, he purfued his route with the fame degree of expedition into Pelagonia, where he took Sintia, a town belonging to the Dardanians, and which would have afforded them a passage into Macedonia. Having finished this busta ness with all possible speed, he turned his thoughts to the war which he had to maintain against the Ætolians and the Romans in conjunction, and marched down through Pelagonia, Lyncus, and Bottiæa into Thessaly, in hopes that many of these states might be prevailed upon to join him in support of the war with the Ætolians. Leaving therefore, at the narrow entrance of Thessaly, one of his generals, named Perseus, with four thousand foldiers, to fecure the pass against the Ætolians, he went himself at the head of his army, before he should be engaged by more important business, into Macedonia, and thence into Thrace and Mædica. This nation had been accustomed, whenever they faw the king employed in a foreign war, and the kingdom left unguarded, to make incursions into Macedonia: he therefore fet about wasting the country about Phragandæ, and laid fiege to the city of Jamphorina, the capital and principal fortress of Mædica. Scopas, when he learned that the king had gone into Thrace, and was employed in carrying on war there, armed all the young men of the Ætolians, and prepared to carry hostilities into Acarnania. This nation, conscious of their inability to oppose him, seeing too that the cities of Æniadæ BOOK and Nasus were already lost, and that they were XXVI. besides threatened with an invasion by the Ro- Y.R.541. mans, formed a plan of action dictated by passion B.C. 211. rather than by prudence. Their wives, children, and all persons above the age of fixty years, they fent away into the neighbouring states of Epirus: while all from fifteen to fixty bound themselves to each other by an oath, to march against the enemy, and not to return home unless victorious; framing a dreadful execration on fuch of their countrymen as should receive into their city or house, or admit to their table or fire-fide, any one who had given way to the toe, or quitted his post in battle. They addressed also a most solemn obtestation, of the same purport, to the states with whom they had an intercourse; befeeching, the same time, the Epirotes to inter in one common tomb fuch of their men as should fall in battle, and to fix this epitaph over their graves: HERE LIE THE ACARNANIANS, WHO DIED FIGHT-ING IN DEFENCE OF THEIR COUNTRY, THE VIOLENCE AND INJUSTICE OF THE ÆTOLIANS. With minds highly inflamed by these and such like means, they encamped in the extreme border of their country, on the fide where they expected the enemy; and, by the dispatches which they sent to Philip, representing the great danger that threatened them, obliged him to drop the profecution of the defigns in which he was engaged, although Jamphorina had already capitulated, and all his affairs were in a prosperous train. The enterprise intended by the Ætolians was postponed, first, on their hearing of the affociation emered into by the Acarpanians; and, afterwards, on the news of Philip's approach, which made them even draw back into the interior parts of their own country. Philip, however, though he had haftened by long marches to prevent the Acarnanians being overwhelmed, yet did not advance farther than Dios, whence, on hearBOOK ing that the Ætolians had retired from Acarnania, he XXVI. also removed to Pella.

Y.R.541. B.C. 211.

XXVI. Early in the fpring Lævinus fet fail from Corcyra, and, doubling the cape of Leucate, came to Naupactum, whence he fent notice, that he was proceeding to Anticyra, in order that Scopas and the Ætolians might be there to join him. Anticyra stands in Locris, on the left hand on entering the Corinthian gulph, and the march thither by land is short, as is the passage by sea, from Naupactum. In about three days after this, the fiege of that town was commenced by the combined forces; but the attack on the fide next the fea was the more difficult to be withstood, because there were on board the fleet engines and machines of every fort; and, befides, the affailants were Romans. In a few days, therefore, the city capitulated, and was given up to the Ætolians. The spoil, according to compact, fell to the Romans. Here Lævinus received a letter, acquainting him that he had been declared conful in his absence, and that Publius Sulpicius was coming to succeed him in the command of the fleet. But he was feized by a tedious fickness, which delayed his return to Kome le than any Y.R. 542. one wished. Marcus Marcellus, et B.C. 210. confulfhip on the ides of March, held, on the fone day, a meeting of the fenate, merely for form's fake, for he declared, that "he would introduce " nothing respecting the state of the commonwealth, " or the distribution of the provinces, in the ab-" fence of his colleague. That he understood that "there were great numbers of Sicilians in the neigh-66 bourhood of the city, at the country houses of " persons who wished to depreciate his character; " and, fo far was he from hindering an open publi-" cation of the charges fabricated and circulated by " his enemies, that he would have given them in-" ftantly an opportunity of laying fuch charges before the fenate, were it not that they pretended some BOOK "kind of fear to speak of a consul in the absence XXVI. " of his colleague. That, however, when Lævinus Y.R.542. " arrived, he would certainly fuffer no business to be B.C. 270. " transacted before the Sicilians were introduced to an " audience of the fenate. That Marcus Cornelius " had made a kind of levy through all Sicily, for " the purpose of sending to Rome the greater num-" ber of complaints against him; and that the same " person, with a view to injure his reputation, had, by " his letters, filled the city with falle representations " of war still subsisting in Sicily." The consul's behaviour on that day made people conceive a good opinion of the moderation of his temper. He then adjourned the senate, and it was expected that there would be atmost a total suspension of every kind of business until the return of the other consul. Want of employment, as usual, gave occasion to various murmurs against the populace: they made great complaint of "the length of the war; of the de-" vastation of the country by Hannibal on all sides " of the city; of Italy being exhausted by levies of men, and of the loss of armies happening of confuls being now elected, who, both of them, had a passion for war; men too ente sing and daring, who, in a time of pro-" found ere capable of exciting quarrels, " and the. to here was the less reason to expect " that, during the actual existence of hostilities, they " would allow the public time to breathe."

XXVII. These discourses were interrupted by a fire which broke out near the Forum, in the night preceding the sestion of Minerva. Seven shops, where sive were afterwards built, and the banking-houses, which are now called the New Banks, were in slames in several places at once. Next, the private buildings were consumed (for the public halls were not then there), with the prison, called the Quarry, and the sish-market, also the old palace of King Numa.

With

BOOK With difficulty the temple of Vesta was saved, prin-XXVI. cipally by the activity of thirteen flaves, who were afterwards purchased for the public, and discharged B.C. 210. from fervitude. The fire raged during a night and a day. There was no doubt of its being caused by human means, the flames blazing out at the fame moment, and at confiderable distances. ful, therefore, by direction of the fenate, published a proclamation, that whoever discovered the persons that had occasioned the same, such discoverer should receive as a reward, if a freeman, a fum of money, if a flave, his liberty. Induced by this, a flave, belonging to the Campanian family of the Calavii, by name Mannus, gave information, that "his mafters, " and five other young Campanian noblemen, whose " parents had been beheaded by Quintus Fulvius, "were the perpetrators of the deed, and that they " would effect the like destruction in various places, " if they were not put into confinement." On this they were taken into custody, as were also their flaves. At first, they spoke with scorn of the informer and his discovery: they said "he had run " away from his mafters, in confequence of having " been chastised the day before with a whipping; " and, in a fit of refentment and folly, had forged " this charge, on the ground of an event merely " accidental." But, when they were brought face to face with their accuser, and the instruments of their villany began to be examined by torture, in the middle of the Forum, they all confessed their guilt; and the masters, and their slaves who were privy to the defign, were punished as they deserved. The informer received his liberty and twenty thousand affes *. The conful Lævinus, as he passed by Capua, was furrounded by a multitude of the Campanians, who befought him, with tears, to give them permission to go to Rome, there to entreat the senate to suffer themselves to be moved, at length, with compassion; BOOK and not to carry refentment fo far as to their utter XXVI. ruin, nor to let the whole race of Campanians be Y.R.542. extirpated by Quintus Flaccus. Flaccus declared, B.C. 210. that "he had no perfonal quarrel whatfoever with 46 the Campanians; a public and hostile enmity to-" wards them he certainly had, and should retain " as long as he knew them to harbour the fame 66 fentiments towards the Roman people. There was " not on earth," he faid, "any race, or any state, " that bore a more inveterate hatred to the Roman " name. The reason of his keeping them confined 66 within the walls was, that when any of them " contrived to get out, they roamed about the coun-" try like wild beafts, tearing and flaying whatever " fell in their way. Some had fled to join Hanni-" bal, others had gone to fet Rome on fire, and the " conful would find, in the half-burnt Forum, the " traces of Campanian villany. An attempt had 66 been made even on the temple of Vesta, on the " facred fire, and the fatal pledge * of the Roman " empire deposited in her shrine. For his part, he " could by no means think it fafe to allow the " Campanians to enter the walls of Rome." Lævihus, however, ordered the Campanians to follow him thither; having first made them bind themfelves by an oath to Flaccus, to return to Capua on the fifth day after receiving an answer from the fenate. Surrounded by this train, and followed also by the Sicilians and Ætolians, who came out to meet him, he proceeded to Rome, bringing into the city, as accusers of two men, whose characters had

^{*} This was the famous Palladium, faid to have been brought by Æneas from Troy, and preserved, with most religious care, in the temple of Westa. What it was, (so facredly was it kept from the public eye,) no one ever certainly knew: supposing it, however, to have resembled the one stolen by Diomede and Ulyffes, as mentioned by Sinon in the Æneid, then it must have been an image of Minerva, armed.

BOOK been rendered illustrious by the conquest of two XXVI. very celebrated cities, the parties whom they had vanquished in war. However both the consuls proposed, first, to the consideration of the senate, the state of the commonwealth, and the disposal of the provinces.

XXVIII. Lævinus then made a report of the state of Macedonia and Greece, of the Ætolians, Acarnanians, and Locrians; and of the services which he himself had performed there, on land and fea; acquainting them, that "Philip, who came " with an army against the Ætolians, had been "driven back by him into Macedonia, and had retired into the interior parts of his kingdom; " and that the legion might be brought home from " thence, the fleet being sufficient to prevent any " attempt of the king upon Italy." This part of the business which respected himself, and the province where he had commanded, he went through alone: the questions relative to the distribution of the provinces were put by both confuls jointly. The fenate decreed, that "Italy, and the war with "Hannibal, should be the province of one of the " confuls: that the other should have the command" " of the fleet lately under that of Titus Otacilius; " and, in conjunction with the prætor, Lucius " Cincius, the government of Sicily." The two armies decreed to them were those then in Etruria and Gaul, confisting of four legions. city legions of the former year were ordered to be fent into Etruria; the two lately under the command of the conful Sulpicius into Gaul; and Gaul, with these legions, to be governed by such person as the conful who had the province of Italy should appoint. Caius Calpurnius, being continued in command for a year after the expiration of his prætorship, was fent into Etruria. Capua was appointed the province of Quintus Fulvius, whose command was also prolonged longed for a year. An order was made, that the BOOK numbers both of the native and allied troops should XXVL be reduced, so that out of two legions should be y.R. formed one, containing five thousand foot and three B.C. 210. hundred horse, and that those men should be discharged who had ferved the greatest number of campaigns; but that, in each legion of the allies, there should be left seven thousand foot and three hundred horse; and that, in discharging the old soldiers, the fame rule should be observed respecting the length of their fervices. With regard to Cneius Fulvius, conful of the last year, no alteration was made, either in his province Apulia, or in the army under his command; only he was continued another year in authority. Publius Sulpicius, his colleague, was ordered to disband his whole force, excepting the marines: as was Marcus Cornelius, as foon as the conful should arrive in the province. To the prætor, Lucius Cincius, for the defence of Sicily, were affigned the troops of Cannæ, equivalent to two legions. To the prætor, Publius Manlius Volfo, were allotted, for the service of Sardinia, the fame number of legions which Lucius Cornelius had commanded in the same province the year before. The confuls were ordered to raife legions for the city, but not to oblige any man to enlift who had ferved in the armies of Marcus Claudius, Marcus Valerius, or Quintus Fulvius, and the number of Roman legions to be employed during that year was fixed at twenty-one.

XXIX. When the fenate had passed these decrees, the consuls cast lots for the provinces. Sicily, and the fleet, fell to Marcellus; Italy, with the war against Hannibal, to Lævinus. This decision, as if Syracuse were now a second time taken, struck the Sicilians, who stood within sight of the consuls, waiting till the lots were drawn, with such dismay,

that

BOOK that their bitter lamentations, and mournful expresfions of grief, attracted the eyes of all present, and afforded afterwards much matter of discourse. B.C. 210. they went round to each of the fenators, dreffed in mourning, and affirming, that "they were resolved "to abandon, not only each his native state, but all "Sicily, if Marcellus should come thither again as " governor. Formerly, when they had deferved to " harsh treatment at his hands, he had been impla-" cable in his refentment towards them; to what 46 lengths, then, might not his anger now carry him, when he knew that they had come to Rome with " complaints against him? Better would it be for "that island to be buried under the fires of Ætna, " or funk in the fea, than to be delivered over as it were to execution at the will of an enemy,"-These complaints of the Sicilians, after being at first carried about to the houses of the nobility, and canvassed in frequent conversations, which took rife either from compassion to the Sicilians, or ill-will Marcellus, made their way even into the fenales. A requisition was there made to the confuls, that the fenate should be consulted on an exchange of provinces. To this Marcellus answered, that "though 66 the Sieilians had been already heard by the fenate, "his opinion might still be different; but in order "that no one should be able to fay that these people "were curbed by fear, or restrained from uttering " their complaints with freedom against a man to "whose power they were soon to be subject; in "the present state of things, if his colleague had " no objection, he was ready to change his pro-"vince." He warmly intreated them "not to preiudge the depending cause by the interposition of se any decree. For fince it would be unjust to give "his colleague his choice of a province without 44 putting it to the lot, how much greater would be 44 the injustice, nay, the indignity, if that which the

"had obtained; by lot were transferred to the BOOK other?" Accordingly the senate, after declaring what was their wish, without passing a decree, adiourned, and the confuls, between themselves, made B.C. are an exchange of provinces. Thus did fate, impending over Marcellus, drag him, as it were, within the sphere of Hannibal; that he who had been the first Roman commander who ravished from that general a large portion of his glory, by defeating him in battle, might be the last who contributed, by his fall, to the aggrandizement of the same man's reputation; and this at a time when the events of the war, in general, were particularly favourable to the fide of the Romans.

XXX. When the provinces were exchanged, the Sicilians were introduced into the fenate, where they expanieted, in many words, on the unalterable attachment of King Hiero to the Roman people, affaming merit from thence to themselves and their nation. " As to the tyrants, Hieronymus, and, after him, Hippocrates and Epicydes, they themselves "had ever detested them," they faid, "for many "Mafons, but particularly for taking part with Han-"nibal against the Romans. For this cause Hiero: "nymus was put to death by the principal young " men of the nation, authorifed, in a manner; "by the public voice. Seventy of their youths; " of the highest distinction, had conspired, on the " fame account, to kill Hippocrates and Epicydes, but were disappointed of the support which they exe pected from Marcellus, by a delay in the bringing " up of his army to Syracule at the time agreed on; " fo that, their defign being discovered, they were "all put to death by the tyrants. Even the tyran! "inical usurpation of Hippocrates and Epicydes owed "its beginning to the cruelty practiled by Marcellus In the facking of Leontini. The principal Syrac "diffins, alarmed at this, never ceased afterwards " imploring DD 2

BOOK " imploring Marcellus, and promising to deliver the " city into his hands, at any time that he chose to "appoint: but his wish was to take it by assault. Y.R. 542. "Finding, however, after every effort which could " be made on land or fea, that this was impracti-" cable, he chose to depend on Sosis, a brazier, " and Mericus, a Spaniard, for putting him in pof-" fession of Syracuse, rather than on the first men " of the city, who had so often, to no purpole, " voluntarily made the same offer; in order, no "doubt, that he might have the more plaufible " excuse for plundering and massacring the oldest " allies of the Roman people. If the defection to "Hannibal had been the act, not of Hieronymus, " but of the senate and people of Syracuse; if the 66 body of the Syraculans, and not their tyrants, " Hippocrates and Epicydes, who held them in fub-" fervience to their will, had shut the gates against " Marcellus; if they had waged war against the "Roman people with the animofity of Carthagi-" nians, to what greater length could Marcellus " have carried hostilities than he did; unless he "were to demolish the city? He certainly left no-" thing at Syracuse except the walls and empty "houses, while the temples were broken open and " pillaged, and from which the ornaments of the gods, and even the gods themselves, had been " carried away. Many were stripped of their whole " possessions, so as not to have remaining, from the " wreck of their fortunes, even the naked foil, out 66 of which they might support themselves and their 66 families. Wherefore they belought the Conscript "Fathers to order restoration to be made to the owners, if not of all their property, at least of " fuch part of it as could be found and claimed on of proof." When they had uttered their complaints in this manner, and were ordered by Lævinus to withdraw from the fenate-house, that the members might deliberate on the subject of their demands;

"No," faid Marcellus, "let them flay, that I may BOOK "answer in their hearing, since, Conscript Fathers, XXVI.

"fuch are the terms on which we serve in your Y.R.542. " wars, that the parties, whom we conquer by our B.C. 210. " arms, are to become our profecutors, and two " cities, taken this year, are to profecute their cap-" tors, Capua Fulvius, and Syracuse Marcellus."

XXXI. The deputies being brought back into the fenate-house, the consul then said; "Conscript "Fathers, I am not so unmindful of the majesty of "the Roman people, and of the high office with "which I am invested, as that I should, while bear-" ing the dignity of a conful, appear as a defendant " to answer charges made by Greeks, if the subject " of the prefent inquiry were merely respecting mis-" conduct on my part. But the question is, not " what I have done, but rather what those men "deferved at my hands. For, if they were not our enemies, I should be equally blameable for injur-"ing Syracuse now, as when Hiero was alive. But, " if they renounced our alliance, attacked our am-" baffadors with violence and arms, thut the gates 66 of their city, and called in an army of Carthagi-" nians to defend it against us; who can think it " unreasonable that men who committed hostilities " should have suffered them in turn? I rejected the " offers of the principal Syracusans to give me pol-" fession of the city, it is true; I chose rather to " confide, in a case so important, solely in Sosis, "and the Spaniard Mericus. You are not the "meanest of the Syracusans, since you object mean-" ness to others. Now, is there one among you, who ever promised to open the gates to me, or " to admit my armed troops into the city? You execrate and abhor those who did; and no not, even here, abstain from reviling them; so far is " it from being fact, that yourselves would have "done the same. The low condition of the per-DD 3

BOOK " fone employed, which these men make a matter " of reproach, shews, Conscript Fathers, how ready "I was to liften to the offers of any man who was " willing to exert himself in the service of our state. "Before I commenced the fiege of Syracuse, I tried 66 to effect a refloration of tranquillity, at one time " by fending ambaffadors, at another time, by going " myself to treat on the subject; and, afterwards, " when they neither scrupled to offer violence to " my ambaffadors, nor would give any answer to " myself in a personal interview with their leaders " at the gates, I then, after furmounting many diffi-" culties on land and fea, at length took Syracuse " by force of arms. Of the consequences which " befel them on the capture of their city, they " might, with more propriety, complain to Hanni-66 bal and the Carthaginians, and to their compain ions in defeat, than to the fenate of the nation " which conquered them. Confcript Fathers, if I " had intended to deny that Syracuse was plundered, "I would never have decorated the city of Rome "with its spoils. As to what I, in capacity of a " conqueror, either took from individuals, or be-" stowed on any, I am fully confident that I acted, " in those respects, agreeably both to the laws of "war and to the deferts of each. That you ratify 4 these proceedings, Conscript Fathers, concerns the interest of the republic more than that of mine. " My duty has been discharged with honour; but "it is of importance to the commonwealth that you do not, by rescinding my acts, render other com-"manders in future remis. And now, Conscript 66 Fathers, as you have heard both the Sicilians and " me face to face, we will retire together from "your house, that the fenators may, in my absence, " deliberate with the greater freedom." The Sick lians were accordingly difmiffed, and he went away to the Capitol to enlift foldiers.

XXXII. The other conful then required the BOOK determination of the fathers respecting the demands of the Sicilians; on which a long and warm debate Y.R. 142. enfued. A great part of the senate, adopting an BC. 220 opinion introduced by Titus Manlius Torquatus, declared, that "in their judgment the war ought to have been waged against the tyrants, who were " equal enemies to the Syracufans and to the Roman " people; that the city ought to have been reco-" vered by treaty, not taken by force; and, when " recovered, should have been re-established in "freedom under its antient laws, and not subjected " to the calamities of war, after having been 44 long harraffed under a wretched flavery. In the "contests between the tyrants and the Roman " general, the prize proposed to the conqueror had 66 been utterly destroyed, a city of the greatest " beauty and fame, formerly the granary and trea-" fury of the Roman people; one by whose gene-" rosity and munificence the republic had, on many 66 occasions of difficulty, and lately, in the present "Carthaginian war, been affifted, honoured, and " adorned. If King Hiero, that most faithful friend to the interests of the Roman empire, were to if rife from the shades, with what face could either "Syracuse or Rome be shewn to him? When, 4 after beholding his native city in its plundered " and half-demolished state, he should, on coming into Rome, see, at the entrance of it, almost "in the very gates, the spoils of his own country?" Although these, and many such warm expressions, tending to disparage the character of Marcellus, and excite compassion for the Sicilians, were uttered by the members, yet the fenate, through their regard for Marcellus, pursued a milder course in forming their decree; the purport of which was, that "all "acts done by him in his administration of the war, and after his final success therein, should be deemed valid. In respect of the time to come,

D D 4

. Mar. 1

BOOK " the senate would take care of the concerns of XXVI. " Syracuse, and would give a charge to the consul "Lævinus, to promote the prosperity of that city, Y.R. 542 as far as could be done without detriment to the B.C. 210. " commonwealth." Two fenators were fent to the Capitol to defire the conful to come back to the fenate-house; and, the Sicilians also being called in, the decree was read. The deputies, after receiving affurances of kindness, were dismissed; and they then threw themselves at the feet of the consul Marcellus, befeeching him to pardon the expressions which they had used, for the purpose of procuring pity and relief of their misfortunes, and to receive them and the city of Syracuse into his protection and patronage. The conful returned a mild answer, and difmiffed them.

> XXXIII. The fenate next gave audience to the Campanians, who spoke in a more piteous strain, but had a more difficult cause to plead; for neither could they deny that they had deserved the punishments inflicted, nor were there tyrants in the case, on whom they could transfer the guilt. They only alleged, that they had fuffered enough of punishment, in fo many fenators being taken off by poison, and fo many by the executioner. That, " of their " nobles, only a few remained alive, whom neither " consciousness of crime had driven to acts of de-66 spair, nor the resentment of their conqueror con-"demned to death: who, in behalf of themselves " and their families, prayed for liberty, and some of portion of their property; being citizens of Rome, " and most of them closely connected there in " affinities and near relationships, in consequence 66 of the frequent intermarriages which took place " during a long feries of years." They were then ordered to withdraw, and the fenators were for fome time in doubt whether Quintus Fulvius should not be called home from Capua, (for the other procenful, Claudius.

Claudius, had died after the taking of the place,) BOOK in order that the matter might be discussed in the XXVI presence of the commander, as had been done in Y.R. 542. the case of Marcellus and the Sicilians. But after- B.C. ste wards, feeing in the house Marcus Atilius, and Flaccus's brother, Caius Fulvius, who had been lieutenant-generals under him; also Quintus Minucius, and Lucius Veturius Philo, who had held the fame commission under Claudius, - men who had been present at every transaction; and being unwilling either to recall Fulvius from Capua, or to delay the Campanians by an adjournment, they defired to hear the fentiments of Marcus Atilius Regulus, whom they deemed fuperior in judgment to any of the rest who had been at Capua; and he fpoke to this effect: "I recollect attending the con-46 fuls, in council, after the reduction of Capua, "when inquiry was made whether any of the Cam-" panians had deferved well of our state; when it was "discovered that two women had done so, Vestia 66 Oppia, a native of Atilla, refident in Capua, " and Fancula Cluvia, formerly a courtefan; the 66 former having daily offered facrifice for the fafety " and fuccess of the Roman people, the latter having fecretly conveyed food to the starving pri-But it was at the same time found, that " the disposition of all the rest of the Campanians " towards us was precifely that of the Carthaginians; " yet those beheaded by Fulvius were not the most " criminal among them, but the most eminent in " rank. How the fenate can determine on the case " of the Campanians, who are Roman citizens, "without an order of the people, I do not see. This " rule was observed by our ancestors, in respect of 46 the revolted Satricans, and measures were taken that Marcus Antistius, plebeian tribune, should "first propose, and the commons pass, an order " empowering the fenate to decide finally in the " affair of that people. My opinion therefore is,

BOOK " that application be made to the tribunes of the XXVI. " commons, that one or more of them may pro-" pose to the people an order authorising us to determine concerning the Campanians." By direction of the fenate, Lucius Atilius, a plebeian tribune, made the proposition accordingly in these words: "Concerning all the Campanians, Atel-" lans, Calatians, Sabatians, who have furrendered "themselves to Fulvius, proconful, and submitted " to the power and dominion of the Roman people; " also concerning whatsoever they may have given " up, whether land, city, divine or human pro-" perty; with respect to all these things, I ask you, "Roman citizens, what you choose should be done?" The commons passed this order:- "Whatsoever the " fenate, being first sworn, or the majority of its " members, then prefent, may determine, that we " will and order."

> XXXIV. In pursuance of this order of the people; the fenate took the business into consideration; and, in the first place, restored to Oppia and Cluvia their liberty and effects, with directions, that "if they " wished to ask any other reward from the senate, " they should come to Rome." Separate decrees were passed respecting the several families of the Campanians, all of which it would be useless to enumerate. The properties of some were ordered to be confifcated; themselves, their wives and children to be fold, excepting fuch of their daughters as had been placed in marriage before they came into the power of the Roman people. Others were ordered to be kept in close confinement, and their cases to be considered at a future time. They also made distinct estimates of the possessions of others, in order to determine whether they should be forfeited or not. They voted, that all the cattle feized, except the horses; all the flaves, except grown-up males; and every thing which did not appertain to the

the foil, should be restored to the owners. They BOOK ordered, that all the Campanians, Atellans, Cala- XXVI. tians, and Sabatians, exclusive of those who, themfelves or their parents, were then among the enemy, B.C. 216 should be free; with the restriction, that none of them should be capable of becoming a Roman citizen; or a Latine confederate; and that none of those who had been in Capua while the gates were shut, should remain beyond a certain day in the city or territory thereof. They voted, that a place of habitation should be affigued to those people beyond the Tiber, and not contiguous to it: that fuch as had neither been in Capua during the war, nor in any Campanian city which had revolted from the Roman pecule, should be removed to the other side of the river Liris, next to Rome; and those who had come over to the Romans before Hannibal came to Capua, to the hither fide of the Vulturnus: that none of them should have land or house nearer to the sea than fitteen miles: that, as to those who should be transplanted to the farther side of the Tiber, neither themselves nor their posterity should purchase or possess property in any other place than in the Veientian, Sutrian, or Nepetian territories; nor should any possess a greater extent of ground than fifty acres: that the property of all the fenators, and of those who had held public employments at Capua, Atella, or Calatia, should be fold at Capua; but that the men of free condition, who according to the order passed were likewise to be fer up to sale, should be sent to Rome. The images and brazen statues, which were said to have been taken from the enemy, whether they were facred private property, they left to the disposal of the college of pontiffs. They then dismissed the Campanians, whose diffress and affliction were increased by these determinations beyond what they had felt at their coming to Rome, and who exclaimed no longer against Fulvius's cruekty towards them, but against BOOK against the rigorous severity of the gods, and their XXVI. own accursed fortune.

Y.R.542. B.C. 210.

XXXV. After the Sicilians and Campanians were difmiffed, a levy of troops was made; and, as foon as that was finished, the business of procuring a supply of rowers for the fleet came under confideration. As there was neither a fufficiency of men for this purpose, nor any money, at that time, in the treasury to purchase or pay them, the confuls published an edict, that private persons should, as on former occasions, in proportion to their fortunes and stations, supply rowers with pay and subfistence for thirty days. This edict caused such loud murmurs and fuch ill-humour among the people, that a leader, rather than matter, was wanting to produce an open infurrection. It was faid, that the confuls, after they had done with the Sici-" lians and Campanians, had taken the Roman " commons in hand, to harass and ruin them: that, " after being exhausted by paying taxes for so many years, they had nothing left but land, and "that naked and waste. Their houses the enemy " had burned; the flaves, who ought to till the " ground, the state had taken away, sometimes " purchasing them for soldiers at a trisling price, " at others ordering them to serve as rowers. If "any one had a little filver or brass, he was " obliged to part with it to pay rowers and the " yearly duties. As to themselves, no authority, " no force, could compel them to give what they " had not. The confuls might fell their goods, " and vent their cruelty on their persons, which were all that remained: nor had they any thing " wherewith they could even redeem or fave them-" felves from fuch treatment." These discontented expressions were uttered not in private, but openly in the Forum, and in the presence of the confuls themselves, by immense multitudes that stood around around them: nor were the confuls able, either by BOOK reproof or confolation, to pacify them. It was at XXVL length determined to give them three days, to con- Y.R.543. fider of these matters; and this time they themselves B.C. 210 employed in procuring information, and contriving the best mode of proceeding. On the following day, they held a meeting of the senate on the subject of a supply of rowers, and after using many arguments to shew that the remonstrances of the commons were but reasonable, they changed the tenor of their difcourse so far as to fay, that "this burthen, whether " reasonable or unreasonable, must be imposed on "the private citizens. How could the fleets be " otherwise manned, as there was no money in the "treasury; and, without fleets, how could Sicily be 66 kept in obedience, Philip be kept out of Italy, or "the coasts of Italy protected?"

XXXVI. In circumstances of such extreme perplexity deliberation was of little avail, and a kind of torpor possessed men's faculties, until the consul Lævinus addressed them thus: "As the magistrates " in point of dignity precede the fenate, and the " fenate the people, so ought they to take the lead " in undergoing every thing burthensome and diffi-" cult. When you wish to enjoin any task on infe-" riors; if you impose the same duty on yourself and " your connections, you will find those inferiors the more ready to obey. Nor is an expence deemed " heavy, when people see those of the highest ranks take on themselves more than their proportion "of it. Do we wish, then, that the Roman people "hould have a fleet, and the means of equipping it? That private citizens should, without murmuring, supply rowers? Let us enforce the edict "first on ourselves. Let us, senators, lodge tomorrow in the public treafury all our gold, filver, and coined brass; each referring of the gold, rings for himself, his wife, and children, and a . ~

BOOK in proportion, on finding that Lucius Marcius, a XXVI. leader who owed his post to the irregular voice of Y.R.542. the multitude, had rendered their victory infignifi-B.C. 210. cant and fruitless. Thus, Fortune holding the scales even, every thing on both fides hung in suspense, and the parties retained their hopes unabated, and their fears unallayed, just as if they were now first commencing the war.

> XXXVIII. One circumstance, above all, filled Hannibal's mind with the most painful reflections; it was, that in consequence of the Romans having profecuted the fiege of Capua with fo much more determined resolution than he had exerted for its relief, many of the states of Italy had conceived fentiments very unfavourable to his cause. He found it impossible to maintain his authority over all of these by force, unless he were to break down his army into a great number of small detachments, which would very ill fuit his condition at the time; nor could he leave the fidelity of allies open to the folicitations of hope, or the threatenings of fear. Wherefore, as his mind had from nature a strong bias to avarice and cruelty, he determined to plunder the places which he could not keep, and fo leave them to the enemy in a state of desolation. scheme, so dishonourable in its purpose, proved equally fo in its confequences: for it alienated from him the affections not only of the persons so greatly aggrieved, but likewise of all the rest; this specimen of his character extending its influence far beyond the numbers involved in the calamity. The Roman conful at the fame time was not remifs in making trials of the disposition of every city where any prospect of success appeared. In Salapia there were two leading men, Dasius and Blasius: the former was a friend to Hannibal; the latter, as far as he could with fafety, favoured the interest of the Romans, and, by means of fecret emissaries, had given 12 given Marcellus hopes of having the place betrayed BOOK to him; but this was a measure, which, without the XXVI. concurrence of Dasius, could not be effected. After Y.R. 542. long and anxious deliberation, and then, rather from B.C. 210. want of a more promising plan, than hope of fucceeding, he opened the proposition to Dasius. But he, being both averse from the design, and glad also of an opportunity of injuring his competitor for power, disclosed the affair to Hannibal, who summoned them both before him; and, while he was employed on his tribunal in difpatching fome other business, intending presently to attend to that of Blasius, the accuser and accused both standing together in a spot cleared for them by the people, Blafius began to urge Dafius on the subject of surrendering the town. On which the latter, as if the matter now proved itself, exclaimed, that the other was attempting to feduce him to treachery, even in Hannibal's immediate presence. To Hannibal, and to those who were present, the more audacious the fact charged on Blasius was, the less credible it ap-They knew that there was an emulation and hatred subsisting between the two, and supposed that an imputation of this kind was alleged, because, as from its nature, it could not be supported by the testimony of witnesses, it was the more likely to be false. The parties were therefore dismissed; but Blasius, notwithstanding what had passed, never defisted from this bold undertaking, until by inceffant teafing on the fame subject, and proving how advantageous fuch a measure would be to themselves and their country, he extorted the other's confent that Salapia, and the Carthaginian garrison, which confisted of five hundred Numidians, should be delivered up to Marcellus. This, however, could not be effected without confiderable bloodshed; for these Numidians were much the bravest body of cavalry in the whole Carthaginian army, and this was an ocBOOK

XXVI.

But though they could not, in the city, make use of their horses, yet, on the tumult arising, they hastily took arms, and attempted to make their way out; when, sinding an escape impracticable, they sold their lives dear, sighting to the last; nor did more than sifty of their whole number sall alive into the hands of the Salapians. The loss of this body of cavalry was a much severer blow to Hannibal than that of the place, for thencesorward the Carthaginians were never superior in cavalry, which they had, hitherto, always been.

XXXIX. At this time the fcarcity in the citadel of Tarentum became almost intolerable. Marcus Livius, commander of the Roman garrison there, relied entirely, for supplies, on Sicily; and to secure to these a safe passage along the coast of Italy, a sleet of twenty ships had been stationed at Rhegium. The charge of the fleet and provisions was intrusted to Decius Quintius, a man of obscure birth, but who, by many brave actions, had acquired a large share of military fame. At first, he had only five ships, the largest of which were two triremes, given him by Marcellus; afterwards, when he was known to have behaved, on many occasions, with much spirit and bravery, he received a reinforcement of three quinqueremes; at last, he himself, by exacting from the confederate states of Rhegium, Velia, and Pæstum, the ships due by treaty, had made up a fleet of twenty fail, as abovementioned. Having, with this fleet, fet fail from Rhegium, he was met at Sacriportus, about fifteen miles from the city, by Democrates, with an equal number of Tarentine ships. The Roman was coming to the relief of the garrison, not supposing it probable that he should meet an enemy; from Croton and Sybaris, however, he had furnished his ships with their full complement of rowers.

rowers, and befides, confidering the fize of his veffels, they were exceedingly well equipped and armed. It so happened, that, just when the Taren- Y.R.542. tine came in fight, the wind entirely died away, a circumstance which gave him full time to adjust the rigging, and put the rowers and foldiers in readiness for the battle that was to follow. They engaged with a degree of ardour feldom shewn by complete fleets, because the objects for which they contended were of more importance than the fleets themfelves. The Tarentines, having recovered their city from the Romans, at the end of almost one hundred years, struggled now to deliver the city also from fubjection; knowing that if, by the exertions of their fleet, they should take from the enemy the dominion of the fea, they would be thereby effectually excluded from even a distant hope of provisions: the Romans, on the other hand, laboured, by retaining possession of the citadel, to shew the world, that the loss of the city was owing, not to the strength or valour of the affailants, but to artifice and treachery. The fignal, then, being given on both fides, they charged each other with the beaks of their vessels, and none, during the conflict, either drew back his own ship, or suffered his adversary to get clear of him, but held it by throwing in an iron grapple; and thus the engagement became fo close, that they fought, not only with missile weapons, but with fwords, and almost hand to hand. The prows, being lashed together, remained unmoved, while the sterns were turned round by the force of their adversaries' The ships were crowded to close together, and within to narrow a place, that fcarcely any weapon fell without effect into the fea. They pressed front against front, like lines of land forces, and the combatants could pass from one ship to another. there was one conflict remarkable above the rest, between two which engaged in the van: in the Roman

E E 2

BOOK man ship was Quintius himself; in the Tarentine, XXVI. Nico, furnamed Perco, who bitterly hated, and was hated, by the Romans, not only in confequence of Y.R. 542. the public quarrel, but also of personal resentment, B.C. 210. the public quarrel, but also of personal resentment, for he was one of that faction which had betrayed Tarentum to Hannibal. This man, while Quintius was encouraging his men, and, at the same time, fighting, and off his guard, darted a spear through his body, and he fell headlong, with his armour, into the sea: then the victorious Tarentine boldly leaped into the ship, where the loss of the commander had thrown all into confusion, and they quickly retired before him. The forepart of the ship was now in possession of the Tarentines, while the Romans, in a compact body, with difficulty defended the poop; when another trireme of the enemy fuddenly appeared at the stern, and the Roman ship, thus inclosed between the two, was taken. The rest, on feeing this, were struck with dismay, and fled in different directions. Some were funk in the deep. and others, being run aground by the rowers, foon became a prey to the Thurians and Metapontines. Of the store-ships, which followed with the provisions, a few fell into the enemy's hands; the remainder flood away into the main, and escaped by shifting their fails with every change of the wind. In the mean-time, the fortune of affairs at Tarentum was not at all the fame: for a party, amounting to four thousand men, having gone out to forage, spreading themselves up and down the country, Livius, the commander of the Roman garrison, who carefully watched every opportunity of acting to advantage, fent out, from the citadel, Caius Persius, an active and brave officer, with two thousand foldiers. He fell upon the enemy while they were fcattered widely, and in fmall parties; and, after continuing for a long time to cut them off, drove the small remainder of this large detachment to the city, where they were admitted mitted through the gates half opened, left the BOOK Romans should enter along with them, and become XXVI. masters of it. Thus the affairs of Tarentum were Y.R. 542. equally balanced, the Romans being victorious on B.O. 210. land, the Tarentines by fea. Both were disappointed alike in their hopes of provisions, even after they had actually come within their fight.

XL. About this time, after a great part of the year had elapsed, and he had been long wished for by both the old and new allies, the conful Lævinus arrived in Sicily, where he judged that the first and most material business to be done, was, the regulating the affairs of Syracuse, which had not yet been reduced into order in the short space since the late pacification. He then led his legions to Agrigentum, which was the only place still in arms, and held by a strong garrison of Carthaginians; and here fortune favoured his enterprise. The Carthaginian's were commanded by Hanno, but placed their whole dependence on Mutines and the Numidians. The latter, making frequent excursions through every part of Sicily, carried off spoil from the allies of the Romans, and neither force nor art could shut him out from Agrigentum, nor hinder him from fallying forth whenever he thought proper. The high reputation which he thus acquired, as it obscured the fame of the commander in chief, excited his envy; fo that even fuccess, because obtained by his means, afforded but little pleasure to Hanno, who at last took from him his commission, and gave it to his own son; thinking that, by divesting him of the command, he should deprive him of his popularity among the Numidians. But the effect was widely different, for, by this discovery of his jealousy, he increased their attachment to Mutines, who did not tamely fubmit to the indignity of this undeferved ill-treatment, but quickly dispatched secret emissaries to Lævinus,

BOOK to treat about the furrender of the town. Through these, mutual affurances were given, and the method of accomplishing the business concerted; and then Y.R.542. of accomplishing the business concerted; and then B.C.210. the Numidians, dislodging or killing the guards, feized a gate which opened towards the fea, and received a party of Romans fent thither for the purpole. When these were already marching into the the heart of the city and the Forum, with much noise and tumult, Hanno, thinking that it was nothing more than fuch a diffurbance and fecession of the Numidians as had happened before, came out to quell the mutiny: but observing, at a distance, that the number was greater than that of those forces, and hearing the Roman thout, with which he was not unacquainted, he refolved, before he came within reach of their weapons, to betake himself to flight. Getting out of the town at an opposite gate, he took Epicydes with him, and came with a intall number to the fea-fide. There they luckily found a bark, and abandoning to the enemy the island of Sicily, about which a contest had been maintained through fo many years, passed over to Africa. of the Carthaginians and Sicilians attempted to fly with blind precipitation, but the gates being closed, they were cut to pieces. Lavinus, on gaining poffession of the town, scourged and beheaded those who had been in the management of the affairs of Agrigentum: the rest he sold, together with the spoil, and remitted all the money to Rome. counts of the fufferings of the Agrigentines spreading through all Sicily, produced at once a general revolution in favour of the Romans. In a short time, twenty towns were betrayed to them, fix taken by florm, and forty put themselves under their protection by voluntary furrender. To the leading men in these states the conful dispensed rewards and punishments according to the merits and demerits of each; and having compelled the Sicilians at length length to lay afide arms, and turn their thoughts BOOK to agriculture, that the island might, from its fertile XXVI. foil, not only afford plenty of subsistence to the in-habitants, but, as it had done on many occasions B.C. 210. formerly, contribute supplies of provisions to Rome, and even to all Italy, he left Sicily, carrying with him a large multitude from Agathyrna. This was a motley rabble, four thousand in number, composed of vagabonds of every description, exiles, and bankrupts, the greater part guilty of capital crimes, who, even when they lived in their native countries under the government of laws, and afterwards, when a fimilarity of condition, arifing from various causes, had drawn them together to Agathyrna, always fupported themselves by robberies and rapines. Such men as thefe, so likely to excite new disturbances, the conful thought it unfafe to leave behind, in an island which had but just then obtained rest from intestine wars, and where the people were but beginning to unite on the terms of concord established by the late pacification: besides, they might prove useful to the people of Rhegium, who wanted a band

XLI. In Spain, Publius Scipio, as foon as the fpring appeared, launched his fhips; fummoned to Tarraco, by an edict, the auxiliary troops of the allies, and then directed the fleets and transports to proceed to the mouth of the river Iberus. place he also appointed for the meeting of the legions whom he ordered out of winter quarters; and he himself, attended by five thousand men of the allied troops, fet out from Tarraco to join the army. When he arrived at the camp, thinking it proper to fay fomething encouraging to the foldiers, particularly those who had been longest in the pro-trained to robberies, for the purpose of ravaging the territories of Bruttium. Thus, fo far as concerned

Sicily, this year put an end to hostilities.

vince.

BOOK vince, and had furvived so many and so great disafters, he called them together, and addressed them in this manner: "Never has there been a new com-Y.R.542. "mander, except myself, who could, with justice " and propriety, give thanks to his foldiers before " he had employed them. Fortune laid me under " obligations to you ere I faw your camp, or "knew my province; first, because you shewed such " dutiful respect to my father and uncle, during "their lives, and fince their deaths; and next, be-" cause, when the possession of the province had " been lost by a dreadful calamity, you recovered it " by your bravery, and have preferved it entire for " the Roman people, and for me who succeed to " the command. But as, through the bounty of " the gods, the defign of our prefent proceedings is " not to maintain our own footing in Spain, but to " deprive the Carthaginians of all footing in it; not " to stand on the bank of the Iberus, and hinder the " enemy from passing it, but to pass over ourselves, " and carry the war to the other fide, I fear lest, " to some of you, the undertaking may seem too " great and too bold, confidering the remembrance of our late misfortunes, and my early time of life. "There is no perfon living, from whose memory " the defeats in Spain can less be obliterated than " from mine; for there my father and uncle lost " their lives within the space of thirty days; so that " funerals in our family followed one another in " quick fuccession. But while the disaster which be-" reft our house of parents, and left me almost the only " furviving member of it, depresses my mind with grief, " still the fortune of our nation, and its courageous spi-" rit, forbid me to despair of the public welfare. " is the lot affigned to us, by fome kind of fatality, " that, in all important wars, we should pass through " defeat to victory. Omitting instances in antient " times, the case of Porsena, the Gauls, and the

" Samnites, I shall begin with the Punic wars. In BOOK "the last, how many fleets, how many generals, XXVI.

"how many armies, were lost? Need I mention Y.R.542. " the like events during the present war? At all the B.C. 210. "defeats I was either present in person, or lamented "more deeply than any other, those from which I " was absent. The Trebia, the Trasimenus, Cannæ, "what are they but monuments of Roman confuls " and armies flain? Then the defection of Italy, " of the greater part of Sicily, of Sardinia; the " extreme terror and affright, when Hannibal's camp "was pitched between the Anio and the walls of "Rome, and that victorious commander was feen " at our very gates. But amidst this general ruin " of affairs, the courage of the Roman people alone " flood unshaken and immoveable. This, when all " our hopes lay prostrate on the ground, raised and " fupported them. And first of all, you, soldiers, " under the conduct and auspices of my father, with-" stood Hasdrubal, when, after the defeat at Cannæ, "he was on his way to the Alps and to Italy; "where, if he had effected a junction with his bro-"ther, the Roman name would not now have been in existence: but the successes obtained here have " counterbalanced the loffes fustained in other places. " At prefent, through the good favour of the gods, " affairs in Italy and Sicily are in a prosperous train, " daily improving, and wearing a more favourable " aspect. In Sicily, Syracuse and Agrigentum have "been taken; the enemy entirely expelled the "ifland, and the province restored to the domi-" nion of the Roman people. In Italy, Arpi has " been recovered, Capua taken; Hannibal, after " a disorderly flight, through his whole route from "the city of Rome, has been obliged to retreat " into the remotest corner of Bruttium, where he " prays to the gods for nothing more than that " he may be permitted to withdraw in fafety, and " quit the land of his enemy. Could there then, " foldiers,

B.C. 210.

BOOK " foldiers, be a greater inconfishency, than that, "when disasters were thus crowded one upon " another, and the gods themselves seemed, in a Y.R.542. "manner, to take part with Hannibal, you, with " my parents, (for I will mention both under the same " revered name,) supported here the tottering for-" tune of the Roman people; and that now when, " in other quarters, every event is prosperous and " joyful, you should let your courage fink? As " to the events which have lately happened, I wish " they had passed without giving me more cause of " mourning than they have given you. Now, how-" ever, the immortal gods, the guardians of the " Roman empire, who inspired all the centuries " with the resolution of ordering the command to " be given to me, by their auguries and auspices, " and by visions in the night, portend all prosperity " and joy. My own mind, likewife, which has " hitherto been my furest prophet, presages that " Spain is to be ours; that the whole Carthaginian " race will foon be banished hence, and spread them-" felves over the lands and feas in their ignominious "flight. What my mind prognosticates from its " own feelings, the same is suggested by reason, and " fupported by arguments of no delufive nature. "Their allies, difgusted by their ill treatment, send " ambassadors to implore our protection; their three " commanders, having quarrelled to fuch a degree " as almost to come to open hostilities, have divided " their army into three parts, and drawn these asunder into countries the most remote from each other. The fame fortune now impends over them " which formerly crushed us; for they are deserted " by their confederates, as we were formerly by the "Celtiberians; and they have divided their forces, " which was the cause of destruction to my father " and uncle. Intestine discord will hinder them " from acting together again; nor will they, fepa-" rately, be able to refift us. Only do you, foldiers, " preferve

" preserve your attachment to the name of Scipio, to BOOK "the offspring of your own commanders; a branch, XXVI.

"as it were, shooting forth from the trunks which "have been felled. You, veteran foldiers, lead your
B.C. 210. ⁶⁴ new commander, and your young affociates, over "the Iberus; lead us into those lands where you " have often marked your route with many deeds 56 of valour. Trust me, you shall soon find, that " the refemblance which you suppose you see in me " to my father and uncle, is not confined to figure, " countenance, and features; but that I inherit no " fmall portion of their capacity, their honour, and "their courage; these you shall find so faithfully " copied from the original, that every man of you " shall fay, that his own commander, Scipio, has either returned to life, or has been born again."

XLII. Having, by this discourse, animated the courage of his men, and leaving three thousand foot and three hundred horfe, under Marcus Silanus, for the defence of the province, he marched the rest of his forces, which amounted to twenty-five thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, Although many now advised, over the Iberus. that, as the Carthaginian armies were separated at so great distances, he should attack the one that lay nearest; yet, apprehending that such a step would probably make them all reunite, and that he should not, alone, be able to cope with the three armies, he determined, for the present, to employ his forces in an attack on New Carthage, a city which possessed great wealth of its own, and was besides, at that time, filled with the enemy's magazines of every kind for the use of the war; there were lodged their arms, their money, and the hostages from all the states of Spain. It was, also, most conveniently fituated for a paffage into Africa, having a harbour fufficiently capacious for any fleet whatever, and, there is reason to think, the only one in all that

*BOOK track of the Spanish coast that joins our sea. No XXVI. one in the whole army knew the destination of its march except Caius Lælius. He was sent round Y.R.542. with the fleet, and ordered to to regulate the failing of it, that the army should come within view, and the ships enter the harbour, at the same point of time. On the feventh day after leaving the Iberus, the fleet and army arrived, as had been concerted, at Carthage; the camp was pitched on the northern fide of the city, and a rampart was thrown up on the rear of it, the front being fecured by the nature of the ground. The fituation of Carthage is this: about the middle of the coast of Spain is a bay, which is open to the fouth-west wind more than to any other, and stretches inland two thoufand five hundred paces, spreading in breadth to an extent fomewhat greater. In the mouth of this bay lies a small island, which breaks the force of the fea, and renders the harbour fecure from all winds except the fouth-west: from the bottom of the bay there runs out a peninfula, confisting of high land, on which the city is built, and this is furrounded on the east and south by the sea; on the west it is inclosed by a morass, which spreads a little way towards the north, and whose depth is variable according as the fea overflows or ebbs. city is connected with the continent by an ifthmus, about two hundred and fifty paces broad; on which, though a fortification would have cost but little labour, the Roman general did not raise any, choofing either to mortify the enemy by this difplay of confidence, or, as he would often have occasion to advance to the walls, to have a retreat

XLIII. When he had completed his works in those parts which required defence, he drew up the ships in the harbour in order of battle, with intent to dispirit the enemy with the sight of a marine force also to be employed against the town; then BOOK. going round the fleet in a boat, he charged the com- XXVI. manders to keep the night-watches with great care, Y.R.542. because an enemy, when he is first besieged, is apt B.C. 210. to make every effort in every quarter. He then went back to the camp, and wishing to explain to the foldiers his reason for preferring this plan of opening the campaign with the fiege of a town, and by exhortations to inspire them with hopes of reducing it, he called them to an affembly, and spoke to this effect: "Soldiers, if any man among you " shall suppose that you have been brought hither " for the fole purpose of attacking a single city, he " will judge merely from the work in which you " are employed, without taking into calculation the " advantages to accrue from it. For you will, in " fact, attack the walls of one city: but, in that one " city, you will capture all Spain. Here are the "hostages of all her illustrious kings and states; " and, as foon as these shall be in your power, they ee will instantly deliver up to our disposal every " thing which is now under subjection to the Car-"thaginians. Here is deposited the enemy's trea-" fure, without which they cannot proceed in the " war, having mercenary troops to maintain; and "which, at the same time, will be most serviceable " to us, as the means of conciliating the friendship " of the barbarians. Here are their engines, arms, " accoutrements, and all their warlike stores, which, "while they answer our purposes, will leave the ene-" my destitute. Besides, we shall gain possession of " a city of distinguished beauty and opulence, and 66 highly convenient to us on account of its excel-66 lent harbour, by means of which we can have " constant supplies, both from sea and land, of every "thing requisite for the maintenance of the war. "And while we acquire to ourselves these great advantages, we shall at the same time strip the " enemy of much greater. This is their grand for-

open.

B.C. 210.

BOOK " tress; this is their granary, their treasury, their " armory; this is the repository of all their wealth. "Hence there is a direct passage into Africa; this Y.R 542. 66 is the only station for a fleet between the Pyrantes " and Gades, and from hence Africa spreads its " terror over all Spain. But as I perceive that you " are arrayed and marshalled for action, let us pass " on, and affault New Carthage with our whole " ftrength, with confidence and courage." To this they all replied with a loud voice, "that they would " do fo;" and he immediately led them to the city, giving orders for the affault both by fea and land.

> XLIV. On the other fide Mago, the commander of the Carthaginians, when he faw the preparations for an affault going forward both on land and fea, disposed his forces in the following manner: opposite to the Roman camp he drew up two thousand of the townsmen; the citadel he garrisoned with five hundred foldiers, and five hundred others he placed on a high part of the city, towards the east; the rest of the troops he ordered to watch carefully every occurrence, and to hasten to whatever spot the shout, or fudden exigencies, might call them. Then, opening the gate, he fent out those whom he had formed in the street leading towards the Roman camp. The Romans, by direction of the general himself, drew back a little, that by being near their camp they might the more eafily receive reinforcements during the engagement. At the beginning, both parties stood their ground, with little advantage on either fide; but, after some time, the reinforcements continually fent from the camp not only drove back the enemy, but pressed them so close, while they fled in disorder, that had not a retreat been founded, they would probably have rushed into the city intermixed with the fugitives. Nor was the consternation greater in the field than in every part of the city; in many places the troops in a panic panic abandoned their posts and fled, and the walls BOOK were left defenceless, those who ought to guard XXVI. them having leaped down wherever they found a Scipio, going up on an eminence called B.C. 210. he ordered all his men to be called out from the camp, to bring scaling-ladders, and advance to the affault. He himself, covered by the shields of three able young men, because weapons of all kinds were now cast from the place in vast numbers, came up close to the works, encouraged his men, and gave the necessary orders. But what contributed above all to inflame the courage of the foldiers, was his being thus an immediate spectator and witness of the bravery or cowardice of every one of them. They rushed forward, therefore, regardless of the enemy, or of the wounds inflicted by them; nor could the walls, or the armed troops with which they were now lined, deter them from mounting with eager emulation. At the fame time an affault commenced. from the ships on that quarter of the town which is washed by the sea. But here, though a great alarm was raifed, little effectual exertion could be made;

XLV. In the mean-time the Carthaginian general had again filled the walls with numerous troops, and great abundance of weapons, brought out from their immense magazines, lay in heaps ready for use. But neither men nor weapons, nor any thing elfe, proved fuch an effectual defence as the walls themfelves: for they were of fuch a height, that few of the ladders could reach the fummit, and the longer any of these were, the weaker they were in proportion:

because, while the men brought in the boats to the fhore, while they hastily landed the foldiers and scaling-ladders, and while every one pressed forward to the land by the speediest way, through their own hurry and impatience they obstructed one another.

BOOK tion: as those, then, who had mounted to the top

XXVI. could not advance, and others nevertheless climbed Y.R.542. up after them, the ladders were broken by the B.C. 210. weight. In feveral cases, where the ladders upright, the men, on rifing to fo great a heigh were feized with giddiness, and fell to the ground While men and ladders were every where falling in this manner, and the enemy, from fuccels, affumed more boldness and alacrity, the fignal for retreat was given. This afforded hopes to the befieged, not only of present rest after such a laborious contest, but also of future safety; as it made them imagine that their city was impregnable by scalade and assault, and that their works were so difficult to be furmounted, that they would always give time to their commanders to bring up forces to their relief. Scarcely had the noise of the first tumult subsided, when Scipio ordered other men, who were fresh and unfatigued, to take the ladders from the weary and wounded, and to renew the affault with additional vigour. Being told at this juncture that the tide was ebbing, and having before learned from fome fishermen of Tarraco, (who used to pass through the morass in light boats, and, when these ran aground, by wading,) that footmen might easily find a passage to the wall, he in person led five hundred soldiers thither. was now about mid-day, and, besides the water being naturally drawn off into the fea by the reflect of the tide, a brisk northerly wind arising, carried the water along, in the fame direction with the tide, and had rendered it so shallow, that in fome places it reached only to the navel, in others scarcely to the knees. This circumstance, discovered in reality by his own diligence and fagacity Scipio attributed, as a prodigy, to the interpolition of the gods, who, to give a passage to the Romans, changed the course of the sea, and removed morasses, opening ways never before trodden by human foot. Impressing impressing this on his men, he bade them follow BOOK to the wall through the middle of the swamp.

LVI. On the land part, the affailants had a most ious task. The height of the walls was not the only obstruction that they met, for, as the enemy had the Romans below them, they could aim their blows against either of their sides as they came up; fo that, while they were climbing, these were more endangered than the fronts of their bodies. But, in the other quarter, the five hundred found no difficulty either in croffing the morals, or mounting the rampart: for neither was that fide strengthened by any work, being deemed fufficiently fecure by the nature of the ground and the marsh, nor was there any party of foldiers or guard stationed at it, because all were intent on bringing succour to the place where the danger appeared. Entering the city, therefore, without opposition, they proceeded with the utmost speed to the gate, at which the whole contest was maintained; and so intent on this dispute were, not only the minds of all, but likewise the eyes and ears of the combatants, and of the people who looked on and encouraged them, that no one perceived that the enemy had entered the place, until their weapons came pouring on their backs, and they found themselves between the two ces. The garrison were so affrighted and confounded, that they were no longer capable of making defence. The walls were feized by the Romans. Tho, both within and without, applied themselves the breaking open the gate, and this being foon to pieces, fo as to leave a clear passage, the pops marched in to the attack. By this time, great numbers had got in by scaling the walls, and these employed themselves every where in killing the towns-Those who had entered by the opening, compoling a regular body, under their officers, and FF main-

BOOK maintaining their ranks, proceeded through XXII. heart of the city into the Forum. ceiving that the enemy fled hence by two diff B.C. 210. ways; some towards the hill, which lay eath and was defended by a garrifon of five hundred others to the citadel, into which Mago himself retired, with almost all the soldiers who had beaten off from the walls, fent one half of his forces to florm the hill, and led himself the other half against the citadel. The hill was taken at the first attack. Mago attempted at first to defend the citadel, but foon feeing every place filled with the enemy, and that no hope remained, furrendered himself, the citadel, and garrison. Until the citadel was furrendered, the foldiers had continued to put the townsmen to the sword in every quarter, nor did they spare any adult who fell in their way; but then, on a fignal given, they defisted from fhedding blood, and, being now completely victorious, they turned themselves to the collecting of the plunder, the quantity of which, of all forts, was immense.

> XLVII. The males of free condition taken prifoners amounted to ten thousand; of these, such as were citizens of New Carthage he discharged, and restored to them the city, and all their effects, which the war had not confumed. There were two there fand artifans, whom he adjudged to be the pull property of the Roman people, giving them hopes of speedily regaining their liberty, provided the worked industriously in the service of the army. the rest of the multitude, all the younger inhabitant and the able-bodied flaves, he fent to fill up numbers of rowers in his fleet, which he augment with eight ships captured here. Besides all the were found the hostages of the Spanish states, who were treated with as much care and attention, as if they had been the children of allies. The quantity

Manilitary stores taken was exceedingly great; ca- 2002 leas, of the larger fize, one hundred and twenty. he smaller, two hundred and eighty-one; baltarge, twenty-three, imall, fifty-two; of icor- B.C. 410 , large and imall, and of arms and missive wea-, a vast number; military standards, seventy-Of gold and filver also, a prodigious mass was brought in to the general; there were two hundred and feventy-fix golden bowls, every one of them almost of a pound weight; of filver, wrought and coined, eighteen thousand three hundred pounds weight, and of filver utenfils a prodigious number. 'All these articles were weighed and reckoned to the quæstor Caius Flaminius; besides forty thousand pecks of wheat, and two hundred and seventy thoufand of barley. One hundred and thirteen storeships were boarded and taken in the harbour, several of them with their cargoes, confisting of corn and arms: likewise brass, iron, canvass, hemp, and other materials proper for equipping a fleet: fo that, among fuch vast stores of every thing useful in war, Carthage itself was the least valuable acquisition.

XLVIII. Scipio, ordering Caius Lælius, with the marines, to guard the city, led back the legions into their camp. As the foldiers were much fatigued by having gone through, in one day, every different kind of fight; for they had engaged the enemy in the field, had undergone great labour and danger in forming the city, and, after it was taken, had fought on disadvantageous ground with those who had taken refuge in the citadel; he directed them to employ the remainder of that day in taking refreshment and rest. On the day following, having called to ether both the land and the naval forces, he bewith returning praise and thanks to the immortal gods, who had " not only, in the space of one day, given him possession of the most opulent wity " in all Spain, but had previously ampassed in it

BOOK " the greatest part of the wealth of that country, " and of Africa also, so that no resources were now " left to the enemy, while he and his army had a 2. 546. "fuperfluity of all things." He then highly the mended the courageous behaviour of the foldiers. observing, that "neither the force sent out against "them, nor the height of the walls, nor the unex-" plored fords of the morals, nor a fort feeted on a steep hill, nor the citadel, though most " strongly fortified, had deterred them from fur-"mounting and breaking through every obstacle. "Wherefore, though he owed every acknowledg-" ment to them all, nevertheless the person who 66 first mounted the wall was entitled to the peculiar " honour of a mural crown;" and he defired that he who thought himself deserving of that present should claim it. Two claimants appeared, Quintus Trebellius, a centurion of the fourth legion, and Sextus Digitius, one of the marines: but the warmth with which they themselves supported their pretenfions was far inferior to the eager zeal which each excited in his favour among the corps to which he belonged. Caius Lælius, commander of the fleet, favoured the marines, Marcus Sempronius Tuditanus the legionaries. This contention threatening at length to end in a mutiny, Scipio published notice, that he appoint three delegates, who, after examining the merits of the case, and hearing witnesses, should determine which had made his way first into the Accordingly, he named Caius Lælius and Marcus Sempronius advocates for the contending parties, with Publius Cornelius Caudinus, a person uninterested in the cause, as umpire: and ordered these three delegates to sit and determine in it. the dispute was now maintained with greater violence than ever, in consequence of those men of high rank, who had acted, not as advocates, but as moderators in the case, being thus excluded. Wherefore Caius Lælius, quitting the court, went up to the tribunal to Scipio, and told him, that " the proceedings of BOOK " parties furpassed all bounds of temperance and XXVI; moderation, infomuch that they hardly refrained Y.R. 54 % from blows. But, though no violence should B.C. 216 fue, nevertheless such conduct afforded an ill " example; as, in this case, the honour due to merit was fought by one or other through the means of straud and falshood. On this side stood the leconary foldiers, on that the marines, both ready " to fwear, by all the gods, rather what they wished, "than what they knew to be true; and to in-" volve in the crime of perjury not only them-"felves in their own persons, but the military stand-" ards and eagles, and the facred word of a foldier:" he added, that " he brought him this information 44 at the defire of Publius Cornelius and Marcus "Sempronius." Scipio, highly approving of Lælius's conduct, fummoned a general affembly, and there pronounced judgment, that "having received " sufficient proof that Quintus Trebellius and Sextus "Digitius gained the top of the wall at the same "time, in acknowledgment of their bravery he " bestowed mural crowns on both." He then bestowed gifts on the rest, in proportion to their courage and merit: above all, he honoured Caius Lælius, commander of the fleet, with every encomium of the highest kind that could have been paid to himself, and presented him, besides, with a golden crown and thirty oxen.

XLIX. He then ordered the hostages of the Spanish states to be called. What the number of these was, I will not presume to affirm; for I find, in some writers, that they were about three hundred, in others feven hundred and twenty-five. thors differ as much in respect of other particulars: the Carthaginian garrison, one writer says, amounted to ten thousand men; another to seven, another to no more than two thousand. In some accounts ten thou-

BOOK fand prisoners are faid to have been taken, in others above twenty-five thousand. I should set down the Y.R. 542. fcorpions, great and fmall, that were taken, at fixty, B.C. 310. if I were to follow the Greek historian Silenus if Valerius Antias, at fix thousand greater, and thirteen thousand smaller; so contradictory are the several accounts. Nay, they do not even agree as to the commanding officer. The greater number afficer that Caius Lælius had charge of the fleet, while there are some who assign it to Marcus Junius Silanus. Valerius Antias tells us, that it was Armes who commanded the Carthaginian garrison, and who furrendered to the Romans; other writers affert that it was Mago. They vary in the number of the ships taken, in the weight of the gold and filver, and of the money brought into the public treasury. If we are not to remain in a state of doubt, but must believe some or other of their accounts, those which hold the mean, between the highest and the lowest, are most likely to be true. Scipio, however, when the hostages were called before him, first defired them not to be dispirited; for "they had come into "the power of the Roman people, whose wish it always was to bind all to them by kindness, ra-66 ther than by fear; and to have foreign nations " united to them in good faith and amicable alli-" ance, and not in a state of oppression and gloomy " fervitude." He then took an account of the prifoners, distinguishing the number belonging to the feveral states, to each of which he fent expresses, defiring them to come and receive their respective hostages: fome of whom, however, as their ambassadors happened to be present, he restored on the fpot; ordering the quæstor, Caius Flaminius, to take care that the rest should be kindly treated. There now came forward from among the crowd of hoftages, a woman far advanced in years, the wife of Mandonius, brother to Indibilis, the chieftain of the Illergetians: she threw herself at the general's feet, and

and with tears belought him to give the guards more BOOK strict injunctions respecting the care and treatment to be shewn to the women. Scipio assuring her that they should not want any kind of accommodation, it the replied, "Those are not matters about which we 44 are much folicitous; for what accommodation can be confidered as infufficient for perfons in our fituation? Anxiety of a very different kind rends my heart, when I confider the age of these "young persons; for as to myself, I am now beyound any danger of those injuries to which our " fex is liable." On each fide of her stood the daughters of Indibilis, in the bloom of youth and beauty, and feveral others of equal distinction, by all of whom she was revered as a parent. answered,-" Out of regard to myself, and out of " regard to the Roman discipline, I should take care that no right, any where deemed facred, should " fuffer violation from us. In the present case, "the virtue and merit of women of fuch distinction " as you are, who, in the midst of misfortunes, fore get not the delicacy of character becoming the " most respectable of your sex, demand from me " an extraordinary degree of attention." He then gave them in charge to a person on whose strict regularity of conduct he could entirely rely, and gave him a particular charge that they should be treated with all the respect and decency due to the wives and mothers of guests.

L. The foldiers afterwards brought to him, as a prisoner, a damsel of such exquisite beauty, that the attracted the eyes of all. Scipio, on making inquiries concerning her country and parents, difcovered, among other particulars, that she was betrothed to a young prince of the Celtiberians, named Allucius. He therefore immediately fummoned from home her parents, and affianced husband;

BOOK and when the latter arrived, having, in the mean-XXVI. time, heard that he was most passionately enamoured of his intended bride, he addressed his B.C. 210, discourse to him more particularly than to the lady's parents: "A young man myself," said he, "I address myself to a young man, that there may " be the less referve in our conversation on this " occasion. When your mistress, being taken by " our foldiers, was brought to me, and I was told " of the very great affection you have for her, " which indeed her beauty made me readily be-" lieve, I confidered that, in my own cafe, if my " thoughts were not totally engroffed by the affairs " of the public, and I were at liberty to indulge the " pleasurable pursuits adapted to my time of life, " especially in a lawful and honourable love, I " should wish that my affection for my intended " bride, though warm even to a degree of extrava-" gance, should yet be viewed with an indulgent " eye; and I therefore refolved, in your case, where " no tie of duty confines me, to do all in my power " in favour of your passion. Your beloved, while " in my care, has been treated with as respectful an 46 attention as she could have met with, had she " been in the house of your father and mother-in-" law, her own parents. She has been preferved " in perfect fafety, that I might be able to prefent 66 her to you, her purity unspotted, a gift worthy " of me to bestow, and of you to receive. The " only return I require for a present of such value, is, that you be a friend to the Roman people; " and that, if you believe me to be a man of 46 worth, such as these nations have heretofore "known my father and my uncle, you be affured that there are, in the Roman state, great numbers 46 of men like themselves; and that no nation at this day on earth can be named, which you ought less to " choose as an enemy to you and yours, or whose " friendship

"friendship you ought more ardently to desire." BOOK
The youth, overwhelmed at once with joy and diffidence, and holding Scipio's right hand, invoked all Y.R. 44. the gods to recompense, on his behalf, such exalted B.C. 216 goodness: fince his own ability was utterly difproportioned, either to his own wishes, or his benefactor's generofity. Scipio then accossed, in friendly terms, the parents and relations of the young woman, who, having brought with them a very large weight of gold to purchase her liberty, on her being restored to them without ransom, earnestly belought him to accept it from them, affuring him, that they should deem themselves as much obliged by his compliance, as by the restoration of their child in safety. Unwilling to reject fuch pressing solicitations, he ordered it to be laid at his feet; then, calling Allucius to him, he faid, "Besides the dowry which you " are to receive from your father-in-law, you must " take also this marriage-present from me," bidding him carry away the gold, and keep it to himself. Overjoyed by these honours and presents, the young man was difmissed to his home, where he filled the ears of his countrymen with the well-merited praifes of Scipio. "A god-like youth," he faid, "had " come among them; fubduing all, not by the power " of his arms only, but by his goodness and magna-" nimity." Full of fuch fentiments, he made a levy among his dependents, and, within a few days, returned to Scipio with one thousand four hundred chosen horsemen.

LI. Scipio kept Lælius with him to affift with his advice in disposing of the prisoners, hostages, and booty; and when all these matters were properly adjusted, he gave him a quinquereme, and, ordering him to take on board Mago and fifteen senators of Old Carthage, who had been made prisoners at the fame time, fent him to Rome with the news of his fuccess. The few days which he had resolved to

BOOK pass at Carthage he employed in exercising both his land and naval forces. On the first day, the legions made excursions, and evolutions under arms, through B.C. 210. a space of four miles; on the second, he ordered them to review and fcour their arms before their respective tents; on the third, forming opposite parties, they engaged each other, in a manner reprefenting a regular battle, but with blunted weapons, and throwing the like kind of darts. On the fourth they were allowed to rest, and, on the fifth, the rovings commenced again. This regular fuccession of labour and rest, they kept up as long as they remained at Carthage. In calm weather, the rowers and marines pushing out to sea, made trial, in mock sea-fights, of the activity of their ships. Such was their employment on the outfide of the walls, and these exercises on land and sea qualified both their minds and bodies for real action. Within, all parts of the city refounded with warlike preparations, workmen of every kind being collected together in a public arfenal. The general attended to every particular with equal care: at one time he was bufy in the fleet and dock-yard; at another, he headed the legions in their excursions; again, he employed his time in overfeeing the works, which were carried on, with great diligence and emulation, by a multitude of workmen in the arfenals, armory, and dock-yards, and great numbers of necessary articles finished every day. Having thus set on foot these preparations, repaired the breaches in the walls, and established posts for the guard of the city, he set out for Tarraco, and, on his way thither, received as he went along a great number of embassies. Some of these he answered on the road, and dismissed; others he adjourned to Tarraco, where he had appointed a general meeting of all the allies both new and old. Accordingly, this meeting was attended by almost every state on the hither-side of the Iberus, and also by many from the farther Spain. The Carthaginian generals.

generals, at first, carefully suppressed the intelli- BOOK gence of Carthage being taken; afterwards, when XXVI. that event became too notorious to be any longer Y.R.542. concealed or diffembled, they affected to speak of it B.C.216. with little concern. They faid, that "by an unex-66 pected attack, and the efforts of one day, one 44 city in Spain had been surprised and taken in a " manner by stealth: that an inexperienced youth, elated by the acquisition of a prize of but little " consequence, had, by his immoderate joy, in-" posed on it the appearance of an important vic-" tory; but as foon as he should hear that three " generals, and three armies of his enemies, all "flushed with victory, were marching towards him, "he would quickly be struck with the recollection " of the deaths which had happened in his family." Such was their language in public, while they themfelves were fully fensible how great a diminution their strength had suffered in every particular by the loss of Carthage.

HISTORY OF ROME.

BOOK XXVII.

Cneius Fulvius, proconsul, defeated by Hannibal, and slain: the conful, Claudius Marcellus, engages him, with better fuccess. Hannibal, raising his camp, retires; Marcellus purlues, and forces him to an engagement. They fight twice: in the first battle Hannibal gains the advantage; in the fecond, Marcellus. Tarentum betrayed to Fabius Maximus, the consul. Scipio engages with Hasdrubal, the son of Hamilcur, at Betula, in Spain, and defeats him. other prisoners, a youth of royal race, and exquisite beauty, is taken; Scipio sets him free, and sends him, enriched with magnificent presents, to his uncle Masinissa. cellus and Quintus Crispinus, consuls, drawn into an ambuscade by Hannibal: Marcellus is slain; Crispinus escapes. Operations by Publius Sulpicius, prator, against Philip and the Achaans. A census held: the number of citizens found to amount to one hundred and thirty-seven thousand one hundred and eight: from which it appears how great a loss they had sustained by the number of unsuccessful battles they had of late been engaged in. Hasurubal, who had crossed the Alps with a reinfor ement for Hannibal, defeated by the consuls Marcus Livius and Claudius Nero, and slain; with him fell fifty-fix thousand men.

BOOK SUCH was the state of affairs in Spain. In Italy, the consul Marcellus, after regaining possession of Salapia, which was betrayed into his hands, took, by storm, Maronea and Meles, cities belonging belonging to the Samnites. He made prisoner^S BOOK three thousand of Hannibal's soldiers, left in garri- XXVII. fon; the booty, which was considerable, was given Y.R.542r up to the foldiers: Here were found, also, two B.C. 210. hundred and forty thousand pecks of wheat, and one hundred and ten thousand of barley. But the joy occasioned hereby was much less than the grief felt for an overthrow a few days after, near the city Cneius Fulvius, proconful, lay there of Herdonea. encamped, in hopes of recovering that city, which, after the defeat at Cannæ, had revolted from the Romans; but his post was neither strong by nature, nor fecured by proper guards. The negligence natural to that commander's disposition was increased by perceiving that the inhabitants, as foon as they heard that Hannibal, after the loss of Salapia, had withdrawn from that part of the country into Bruttium, began to waver in their attachment to the Carthaginians. Intelligence of all these particulars was conveyed to Hannibal by private messengers from Herdonea; and, while it made him anxious to preferve an allied city, at the fame time inspired hopes of attacking the enemy unprepared. With his troops, therefore, lightly equipped for expedition, he hastened to Herdonca by fuch long marches, that he almost anticipated the report of his approach; and, to strike the greater terror, he advanced in order of battle. The Roman commander, fully equal to him in boldness, but inferior in judgment and strength, hastily led out his forces, and engaged him. legion, and the left wing of allied infantry, commenced the fight with vigour. But Hannibal gave directions to his cavalry, that, as foon as the lines of infantry should have their thoughts and eyes entirely occupied on the contest between themselves, they should ride round; that one half of them should fall on the enemy's camp, and the other on the rear of their troops that were engaged. With a fneer

BOOK on the name of Fulvius, he assured them, that, as XXVII. he had utterly defeated him in the fame country two years before, the present battle would have a similar issue. Nor was this expectation ill-grounded: for, after many of the Romans had fallen, in the close conflict between the lines of infantry (the companies and battalions nevertheless still maintaining their ground), the tumult raised by the cavalry in the rear, and the enemy's shout from the camp, which was heard at the same time, put to flight the sixth legion, which, being posted in the second line, was thrown into disorder by the Numidians; as were afterwards the fifth, and those in the van. fled in hurry and confusion, the rest were surrounded and flain; among whom fell Cneius Fulvius himfelf, with eleven military tribunes. How many thousands of the Romans and allies were flain in that battle. who can positively affirm, when I find in some historians thirteen thousand, in others not more than feven? The conqueror possessed himself of the camp and the spoil. Having discovered that Herdonea was disposed to revolt to the Romans, and would not continue faithful to him after his departure, he removed the inhabitants to Metapontum and Thurium, and burned the city to the ground. leaders of the party, who were found to have held fecret conference with Fulvius, he put to death. The Romans who escaped the slaughter of this disastrous day, fled, half-armed, by different roads into Samnium, to the conful Marcellus.

> II. Marcellus, not too much difmayed by fo great a difaster, wrote to Rome to the senate an account of the general and army being lost at Herdonea; adding, that, notwithstanding this misfortune, "he, " who had quelled the haughty spirit of Hannibal, "when his confidence was at the highest, in " consequence of his victory at Cannæ, was how "going " going against him, with the same degree of reso- BOOK " lution, and would take effectual care that his XXVII. " present joy and exultation should be short." At Rome, as people's grief for the past was great, so B.C. The were their fears of the future. The conful, passing over from Samnium into Lucania, pitched his camp at Numistro, on level ground, within view of Hannibal, who was posted on an hill. He gave, besides, another proof of confidence in his own strength. for he was the first to offer battle. Nor did Hannibal, on feeing the standards advance through the gates, decline the challenge. However, they drew up their forces in fuch a manner, that the right wing of the Carthaginians stretched up the hill, and the left wing of the Romans was brought close to the town. From the third hour, the action had lasted until night, and the fatigue of fighting for such a length of time had overpowered the foremost lines, confisting, on the side of the Romans, of the first legion and the right wing of allies; on Hanmibal's fide, of the Spanish infantry, Balearick flingers, and the elephants, which, at the beginning of the engagement, had been brought into the field. And now the fight flagged for a confiderable time, neither party having gained any advantage, when the third legion advanced into the place of the first, and the left wing of the allies into that of the right; on the fide of the enemy, likewife, the wearied were relieved by fresh troops. On this, both parties being in full spirits and vigour, instead of the former languid efforts, a furious conflict at once arose; but night separated the combatants before the victory could be decided. Next morning, the Romans stood, in order of battle, from funrife, during a great part of the day, and none of the enemy coming out to face them, gathered the spoils at their leisure. and collecting the bodies of their flain into one spot, burned them on a funeral pile. In the following night,

Y.R.542.

BOOK night, Hannibal decamped in filence, and marched XXVII. off towards Apulia; but, as foon as day-light difcovered the enemy's flight, Marcellus, leaving his B.C. 210, wounded at Numistro, with a small garrison, the command of which he gave to Lucius Furius Pura pureo, a military tribune, fet out immediately in close pursuit, and overtook him at Venusia. during feveral days, many skirmishes happened between parties fallying from the outposts, in which infantry and cavalry were intermixed, and which produced more noise and tumult than real advantage to either fide; but which, in general, terminated in favour of the Romans. From thence the two armies marched through Apulia without any engagement of consequence; for Hannibal, seeking opportunities for stratagems, removed always by night, Marcellus never following but in clear day-light, and after having carefully examined the country through which he was to pass.

> III. Meanwhile, as Flaccus was spending much time at Capua, in felling the property of the nobility, and fetting to farm the forfeited cstates, all of which he let for a rent of corn, he was furnished with a fresh occasion for practising severity on the Campanians; for he received certain information of a wicked scheme, of an extraordinary nature, which had for fome time been hatching in fecret. Having removed the foldiers out of the houses, for two reasons, first, because he chose that the houses of the city should be held along with the lands; and, next, because he feared lest excessive luxury might enervate his army. as it had that of Hannibal, he had made them build huts for themselves, in the military manner, near the gates and walls. Now most of these were formed of hurdles, or boards, some of reeds interwoven, and all of them covered with straw, as if purposely intended for combustion. One hundred and seventy Camparans, at the head of whom were two brothers, of the name of Blosius had conspired to set fire to all these, BOOK at one hour of the night. But the defign was dif- XXVII. covered by some slaves belonging to the Blossi, Y.R.542. whereupon, the gates being instantly shut by order B.C. 210. of the proconful, and the foldiers having, on the fignal being given, affembled under arms, all who were concerned in the conspiracy were seized, and after undergoing a fevere examination by torture, condemned and put to death. The informers were rewarded with their freedom, and ten thousand affes* each. The Nucerians and Acerrans, having complained that they had no place of habitation, as Acerra was partly burned, and Nuceria demolished, Fulvius fent them to Rome to the senate. Permisfion was granted to the Acerrans to rebuild what had been thus destroyed; and the Nucerians, agreeably to their own choice, were transplanted to Atella, the inhabitants of the latter being ordered to remove to Calatia. Among the multiplicity of important affairs, (some prosperous others adverse,) which occupied the thoughts of the public, even the citadel of Tarentum was not forgotten: Marcus Ogulnius and Publius Aquilius, being commissioned for the purpose, went into Etruria to purchase corn, which was to be conveyed to Tarentum; and, togethe with the corn, were fent thither, as a re-inforcement to the garrifon, one thousand men out of the city troops, confisting of equal numbers of Romans and allies.

IV. The fummer was now nearly elapsed, and the time of the confular election drew nigh: but a letter received from Marcellus, affirming that it would be injurious to the public interest, if he were to depart a step from Hannibal, who was retreating before him, while he, by a close pursuit, distressed him materially, threw the fenate into some perplexity, as

^{* 32} l. 5 s. 10 d.

BOOK they were unwilling either to call home the conful. XXVII. at a time when he was most actively employed against the enemy, or to let the year pals without confide. B.C. 210. It was judged most advisable, though the other conful Valerius was abroad, that he should rather be recalled, and even from Sicily. Accordingly, in pursuance of an order of the senate, a letter was fent to him by Lucius Manlius, practor of the city, and, together with it, that of the conful Marcellus, that from them he might perceive the reaken, which induced the fenate to recall him from his province, rather than his colleague. About this time ambaffadors came to Rome from King Syphax. with a recital of all the fuccessful battles which he had fought against the Carthaginians, and affurances that "their King entertained not a more inveterate enmity to any nation than to the Carthaginian, on nor-a more warm friendship for any than for the "Roman;" adding, that "he had before lent embassies into Spain, to the Roman generals, Caeius and Publius Cornelius; and that he now withed " to feek, as it were at the fountain head, the friendship of the Romans." The senate not only answered his ambassadors with kindness but fent others in return, charged with presents to the King: these were Lucius Genucius, Publius Petelius, and Publius Popilius. The presents which they carried were, a purple gown and veft, an ivory chair, and a golden bowl of five pounds weight. They received orders also to proceed to visit other chieftains of Africa, carrying with them donatives of gowns with purple borders, and golden bowls weighing three pounds each. To Alexandria, alfo, were Sent Marcus Atilius and Manius Acilius, in embaffy to King Ptolemy Philopater and Queen Cleopara, to revive and renew the former treaty of friendship; bearing with them a purple gown and veft, with an ivory chair, for the King; an embroidered gown and a purple robe for the Queen. During this furniture.

many prodigies were reported from the neighborning BOOK titles and country; that at Tufculum, a lamb was XXVII. increased with its udder full of milk; and that the memble of Sumiter was struck on the roof by lightaing, and almost entirely stripped of its covering: that at Anagnia, about the fame time, the ground before one of the gates was fired, and without the aid, of any combustible matter continued burning and a night; that at Compitum, in the difwist of Anagnia, the birds for look their nests on the trees in the grove of Diana; that near the much of the harbour of Tarracini, inakes of wondistribl fize were feen in the fea, and sporting like Gillies; that at Tarquinii, a pig was littered which had a human face; and that, in the district of Capena, at the grove of Feronia, four statues sweated blood profusely for a day and a night. These evil omens were expiated with victims of the greater hind, in conformity to the order of the pontiffs; a supplication was ordered to be performed at all the Arrines, one day at Rome, and another in the diffect of Capena, at the grove of Feronia.

W. The conful Marcus Valerius, on receipt of the letters by which he was fummoned home, gave the command of the province and the army to the prætor Cincius; sent Marcus Valerius Messala, commander of the fleet, with half of the ships to Africa, to plunder the country, and, at the fame time, to gain intelligence of the motions and intentions of the Carthaginians: then he fet out himfelf with ten thips, and arriving at Rome, after a profe purous voyage, immediately convened the fenate. he recited the fervices which he had performed; that "after hostilities had been carried on Man Sicily, and many severe losses sustained on stabled and less thuring almost fixty years, the had Miltought the war so a final termination. That 4 15-1 there G G 2

Y.R. 542. B.C. 210.

BOOK "there was not one Carthaginian in Sicily, nor XXVII. " one Sicilian, of those who had been compelled " by fear to fly and live abroad, who was not then at " home; that all had been reinstated in the possession " of their own cities and estates, and were employed " in plowing and fowing; that the land, after hav-" ing been long deferted, was at length filled again " with inhabitants, and in a condition both to afford " plenty to its occupiers, and the most certain sup-" plies of provisions to the Roman people either in " peace or war." After this, Mutines, and fuch others as had deserved well of the Roman people, were introduced to the senate; who, to fulfil the engagements of the conful, bestowed rewards on them all. Mutines was even made a Roman citizen, an order for that purpose being proposed to the commons by a plebeian tribune, in purfuance of directions from the senate. While these matters passed at Rome, Maicus Valerius Messala, with fifty ships, arriving on the coast of Africa before day, made an unexpected descent on the lands of Utica, which he ravaged to a great extent; and, after taking many prisoners, and other booty of every kind, reimbarked, set fail for Sicily. and returned to Lilybæum, on the thirteenth day after he had left it. On examining the prisoners, the following particulars were discovered, and all, in order, communicated by letter to the conful Lævinus, that he might know the real state of affairs in Africa. That " there were at Carthage five thousand Nu-" midians, commanded by Masinissa, son of Gala, " a young man of a very enterprising spirit; and that people were employed in all parts of Africa, 44 in hiring other troops, which were to be fent 46 to Spain, to Hasdrubal, in order that, with the " most numerous army which he could muster, and with all possible expedition, he might pass over " into Italy and join Hannibal. That on this " meafure measure the Carthaginians placed all their hopes BOOK " of fuccefs. That, befides this, they were fitting XXVII. " out a very great fleet for the recovery of Sicily, Y.R.542. and that the prisoners believed it would fail this B.C. sto. "ther in a very fhort time." When the letter containing this information was read, it made fo great an impression on the senate, that they all concurred in opinion, that the conful ought not to wait for the elections, but to nominate a dictator to hold them, and return without delay to his province. This plan was obstructed by a dispute which arose; for the conful declared that he would nominate dictator Marcus Valerius Messala, who was then in Sicily commanding the fleet; but the senate insisted, that a dictator could not be nominated who was in any place out of the Roman territory, which extended not beyond the limits of Italy. Marcus Lucretius, plebean tribune, proposing the question hereupon, the senate decreed thus; " that the conful, before 46 he left the city, should consult the people as to who they wished to be appointed dictator, and " should nominate to that office whomsoever they " should order. That, if he refused this, the prætor " fhould hold the meeting, and if he also were unwilfing to do it, that then the tribunes should propose "the question." Valerius declared, that he would not ask the judgment of the people on a matter properly belonging to his own jurisdiction, and he forbade it in the prætor; on which the plebeian tribunes proposed the question, and the commons ordered. that Quintus Fulvius, then at Capua, should be created dictator. But in the night preceding the day on which the affembly of the people was to be held,"the conful went off privately to Sicily; and the fenate, left thus unsupported, took the resolution of ordering a letter to be fent to Marcus Claudius, defiring him to give affiftance to the commonwealth. which his colleague had deferted, and to nominate G G 3

BOOK the dictator fixed on by the people. Accordingly, XXVII. Quintus Fulvius was nominated dictator by the Y.R.542. conful Claudius; and, in compliance with the same B.C. 210. order of the people, the dictator, Quintus Fulvius, named Publius Licinius Crassus, then chief pontist, mafter of the horfe.

> VI. The dictator, on coming to Rome, fent Cneius Sempronius Blæsus, who had been a lieutenant-general under him at Capua, into the province of Etruria, to take the command of the army there, in the room of the prætor, Caius Calpurnius, whom he called away by letter, to command his own army at Capua. He appointed for the elections the earliest day on which they could be held; but a dispute arising between the dictator and the tribunes, they could not be finished on that day. The younger Galerian century having obtained by lot the privilege of voting first, named as confuls, Quintus Fulvius and Quintus Fabius; and the centuries, voting in their course, would have followed them, had not two plebeian tribunes, Caius and Lucius Arennius, interposed. They afferted that " the re-electing of the fame person to the supreme " magistracy was not easily reconcileable to the " principles of a republic; and much more perni-" cious would the precedent be, if the very person " who prefided at the election were himself to be 44 chosen. If therefore the dictator admitted his own " name in the lift of candidates, they would protest " against the election; but, if he received on the " lift any other except himself, they would give " no obstruction to the business." The dictator maintained the propriety of the proceedings of the affembly, on the grounds of a vote of the fenate, an order of the people, and feveral precedents. For " in the consulate of Cneius Servilius, when 44 the other conful Caius Flaminius had fallen at " the

" the Trasimenus, the question was, by direction BOOK " of the senate, proposed to the people, and the XXVII. " people ordered that, fo long as the war conti- Y.R.544. " nued in Italy, it should be lawful for them to re- B.C. ajo. elect to the confulfhip, and that as often as they 66 should see proper, any of those who had already 46 held that office. As to precedents in point, he 44 had one of ancient date, in the case of Lucius ⁶⁶ Postumius Megellus, who, while he was interrex, was, in the affembly where he himself presided, " created conful, with Caius Junius Bubulcus; and " a recent one, in the case of Quintus Fabius, who certainly would never have fuffered himself to be " re-elected, if it were inconsistent with the public "good." After long dispute, maintained by these and fuch arguments, an agreement at last took place between the dictator and the tribunes to abide by the determination of the fenate. The fenators were of opinion, that the present state of the commonwealth was fuch as required that the administration of its affairs should be in the hands of experienced commanders, skilled in all the arts of war; and they therefore disapproved of any opposition to the proceedings of the affembly of election. The tribunes then acquiesced, and the election proceeded. Quintus Fabius Maximus a fifth time, and Quintus Fulvius Flaccus a fourth, were declared confuls. The following persons were then elected prætors: Lucius Veturius Philo, Titus Quintus Crispinus, Caius Hostilius Tubulus, Caius Arunculeius. As soon as the appointment of magistrates for the year was finished, Quintus Fulvius resigned the dictatorship. Towards the end of this fummer, a Carthaginian fleet of forty ships, under the command of Hamilcar, failed over to Sardinia, and committed great depredations in the district of Olbia. Afterwards, on the prætor, Publius Manlius Vulfo, appearing there with an army, they proceeded to the other fide of the island,

Y. R.542. B.C. 210.

BOOK and ravaged the lands of Caralita, from whence they XXVII. returned with booty of all kinds to Africa. Roman priests died this year, and others were substituted in their places. Caius Servilius was made a pontiff, in the room of Titus Otacilius Crassus; Tiberius Sempronius Longus, son of Tiberius, an augur, in the room of Otacilius Crassus; and the fame Tiberius Sempronius, a decemvir for directing religious rites, in the room of Tiberius Sempronius Longus, fon of Caius. Marcus Marcius, king in religious matters, and Marcus Æmilius Papus, chief curio, died, but their places were not filled up during this year. Lucius Veturius Philo, and Publius Licinius Crassus, chief pontiff, were created censors for the year. Licinius (raffus had not, before this appointment, been either conful or prætor, but was advanced, at one step, from the ædileship to the cenforship. However, these censors neither chose a senate, nor transacted any public business, being prevented by the death of Lucius -Veturius, on which Licinius abdicated the office. The curule ædiles, Lucius Veturius and Publius Licinius Varus. repeated the exhibition of the Roman games once. The plebeian ædiles, Quintus Catius and Lucius Porcius Licinius, out of the money accruing from fines, erected brazen statues in the temple of Ceres, and exhibited games with much magnificence and fplendor, confidering the circumstances of those times.

> VII. At the end of the year, Caius Lælius, Scipio's lieutenant-general, on the thirty-fourth day after he fet fail from Tarraco, arrived at Rome, and passing through the streets, with the train of prisoners whom he brought, attracted a vast concourse of people. Next day, being introduced to the fenate, he delivered the advices with which he was charged, that Carthage, the metropolis of Spain, had been reduced in one day, several revolted cities brought brought back to obedience, and new alliances formed BOOK with others. From the prisoners, information was XXVII. gained, corresponding, in general, with that contained in the letter of Marcus Valerius Messala. B.C. 210. What gave the greatest uneafiness to the fenate, . was Hasdrubal's intended march into Italy, which was scarcely able to withstand Hannibal, and the force which he had already with him. Lælius allo, coming out into the general affembly, gave a fimilar account. The fenate, in confideration of the fervices performed by Publius Scipio, decreed a fupplication for one day; and then ordered Caius Lælins to return with all expedition to Spain, with the ships which he had brought thence. On the authority of a great many historians, I have fixed the taking of Carthage in this year, although I am not ignorant that feveral have placed it in the year following; but it appeared to me very improbable, that Scipio should have passed a whole year in Spain without doing any thing. The consulate of Quintus Y.R. (43. Fabius Maximus, a fifth time, and Quintus Fulvius B.C. 2001. Flaccus, a fourth, commencing on the ides of March, a decree was passed on the same day, appointing Italy the province of both, but they were to command separately in different quarters; Fabius to conduct the operations of the war at Tarentum, Fulvius in Lucania and Bruttium. cus Claudius was continued in command for a year. The prætors then cast lots for their provinces: Caius Hostilius Tibullus obtained the city jurisdiction; Lucius Veturius Philo, the foreign, with Gaul; Titus Quintus Crispinus, Capua; and Caius Arunculeius, Sardinia. The troops were distributed among the provinces in this manner: to Fulvius, were decreed the two legions which Marcus Valerius Lævinus had in Sicily; to Quintus Fabius, those which Caius Calpurnius had commanded in Etruria; the city troops were to replace those in Etruria, and Caius Calpurnius was to command the fame

BOOK province, with the army; Titus Quintius was to which had ferved there under Quintus Fulvius;
B.C. 200 Lucius Veturius was to receive, from Caius Lætorius proprætor, the province of Ariminum, with the army then on the spot; to Marcus Marcellus. were affigned the legions which he had in his confulate acted fuccessfully; to Marcus Valerius, in conjunction with Lucius Cincius, (for they also were continued in command in Sicily,) the troops of Cannæ were given, with orders to complete their full complement out of the furviving foldiers of Cneius Fulvius's legions. These were collected together, and fent by the confuls into Sicily, being stigmatized by the same ignominious order under which the troops of Cannæ served, and those of the army of the prætor Cneius Fulvius, whom the fenate, through resentment at the like cowardice, had formerly ordered thither. To Caius Arunculeius were affigned, for Sardinia, the fame legions which had ferved in that province under Publius Manlius Vulfo. Publius Šulpicius was continued in command for a year, to hold the province of Macedonia, and with the fame legion and the fame fleet which he then had. Thirty quinqueremes were ordered to be fent from Sicily to Tarentum, to Quintus Fabius the conful; and, with the rest of the fleet. Marcus Valerius Lævinus was either to fail over to Africa himself, to ravage the country, or to fend thither Lucius Cincius, or Marcus Valerius Messala. With respect to Spain no change was made, only that Scipio and Silanus were continued in command, not for a year, but until they should be recalled by the senate. Such was the distribution made of the provinces, and of the commands of the armies for that year.

> VIII. Among other business of more serious importance, the affembly, convened for the purpole of electing to the priesthood a chief curio, in the BOOK room of Marcus Æmilius, revived an old dispute; XXVII. for the patricians infifted, that Caius Mamilius Vitulus, the only plebeian candidate, ought not to be B.C. 109. allowed to stand, because none but a patrician had ever held that office of the priesthood. The triburnes, being appealed to, referred the business to the fenate. The fenate voted, that the people might act therein as they should think proper. Thus Caius Mamilius Vitulus was elected chief curio, being the first plebeian admitted into that office. Licinius, chief pontiff, compelled Caius Valerius Flaccus, against his will, to be inaugurated flamen of Jupiter. Caius Lætorius was created decemvir for the performance of religious rites, in the room of Ouintus Mucius Scævola deceased. I should willingly pass over in filence the reason of the flamen being forced into the office, labouring, as he then did, under a bad character, had he not afterwards acquired a very good one. Caius Flaccus had fpent his youth in idleness and debauchery, and his vicious courses had drawn on him the displeasure of his own brother Lucius Flaccus, and of his other relations: and Publius Lucius was in hope of reclaiming him. Indeed, when his thoughts became engaged in the care of the facrifices and religious performances, he quickly made fuch a complete alteration in his conduct, from what it had hitherto been, that, among all the young men of the time, no one was held in higher esteem, or more entirely approved by the principal patricians, by his own family, and by all. This universal good character inspiring him with a proper fense of his own worth, he afferted a privilege which had for many years been laid aside, on account of the unworthiness of former flamens, that of having a feat in the fenate. On his coming into the fenate-house, the prætor, Lucius Licinius, led him out; on which he appealed to the tribunes of the commons, alleging that he only claimed an ancient

BOOK ancient privilege of his priesthood, which was com-

XXVII. ferred on the office of flamen, together with the y R. 143. purple-bordered robe and the curule chair. The B.C. 209. prætor argued that such a right depended not on the copies of annals, rendered obsolete by their antiquity, but on the customary practice of more recent times; and that in the memory of their fathers and even grandfathers no flamen of Jupiter had been allowed it. The tribunes thought it reasonable, that, as the right had been suffered to fall into disuse through the inattention of former flamens, the injury enfuing should affect only themfelves, and not the office; and accordingly, without any opposition from the prætor himself, and with the universal approbation of the senate and commons, they introduced the flamen to a feat in the fenate, though all men were of opinion that his having attained his object, was owing to the Arich integrity of his conduct rather than to any privilege of the priesthood. The consuls, before they departed for their provinces, raifed two city legions, and fuch a number of foldiers as was necessary to make up the complement of the other armies. The force which hitherto had ferved in the city, the conful Fulvius gave to his brother Caius Fulvius Flaccus, lieutenant-general, with orders to march it into Etruria, and to bring home to Rome the legions then in that province. The other conful, Fabius, having collected the relics of Fulvius's army, which amounted to three thousand three hundred and thirty fix men, ordered his fon Quintus Maximus to conduct them into Sicily, to the proconful Marcus Valerius, and to receive from him the two legions and thirty quinqueremes. The removal of these legions out of the island made no diminution, in respect either of strength or appearance, in the force stationed in that province. For, befides two veteran legions, completely recruited to their full complement, the proconful had a great multitude multitude of Numidian deferters, both horse and BOOK foot, and he also enlisted in his service those Sicilians XXVIII. who had ferved in the army of Epicydes, and that Y.R. 545. of the Carthaginians, men well experienced in war. B.C. 200. By annexing a part of these foreign auxiliaries to each of the Roman legions, he preserved the appearance of two armies; with one of which he ordered Lucius Cincius to guard that part of the island which was formerly the kindom of Hiero; and, with the other, he himself took charge of the rest of it, separated formerly by the boundaries of the Roman and Carthaginian dominions. He likewise made division of the fleet, which confifted of feventy fail, in order that they might extend their protection of the coasts round the whole circumference of the island. tended by the cavalry of Mutines, he went in person through every part of the province, to view the lands, observe what parts were cultivated, and what were not, commending or reproving the owners accordingly. In consequence of his care in this particular, fuch an abundance of corn was produced, that, besides fending a quantity to Rome, he conveyed to Catana a fufficient supply for the army, which was to be employed during the fummer at Tarentum.

.IX. But the transportation of those soldiers into Sicily, the greater part of whom were Latines and allies, was very near proving the cause of formidable disturbances; so true it is, that the issues of great affairs often depend on trivial circumstances. For the Latines and allies, in their meetings, began to murmur, that "they had now for ten years been "drained by levies and contributions. That, gene-" rally every year, they fuffered great losses in the " war. Many were flain in the field, many were " cut off by fickness; and that every one of their countrymen, enlisted as a foldier by the Romans, was more effectually lost to them, than if he were " taken prisoner by the Carthaginians; because the

#00 % " latter was fent back, without ranfom, to his cours-EXVII. " try, whereas the other was ordered by the Romans out of Italy, into banishment indeed, rather than to The troops of Cannae were now " growing old in that fituation, having been in it " nearly eight years, and would end their lives before the enemy, whose strength was at the present " in a state particularly flourishing, would retire out 66 of Italy. If veteran foldiers were not to return home, and still new ones to be enlisted, there would not, in a short time, be one of that descrip-"tion remaining. Wherefore it was become necessary, before they should be reduced to the last "degree of defolation and want, to deny to the 66 Romans that which particular circumstances atone would shortly render it impossible to grant. 44 that people faw the allies cordially uniting in " fuch a measure, they certainly would think of " making peace with the Carthaginians: otherwise, " as long as Hannibal lived, Italy would never be " free from war." Thus did they argue in their affemblies. The Roman colonies were, at this time, thirty in number; all of whom had ambassators at Rome; and twelve of them presented a remonstrance to the confuls, stating that they had not the means of furnishing the supplies of men and money. These were Ardea, Nepete, Sutrium, Alba, Carseoli, Cora, Sueffa, Circeii, Setia, Cales, Narnia, and Interamna. The confuls, surprised at such an extraordinary declaration, and wishing to deter them from the meditated secession, to which end they supposed that censure and reproof would be more effectual than gentle measures, answered, that "the " expressions which they had dared to use were such 46 as the confuls could not prevail on themselves to " repeat in the fenate. For they contained not a " refusal of military duty, but an open desection " from the Roman people. They advited them, st therefore, to return home instantly to consult " with 12

" with their respective countrymen, as if no step BOOK had yet been taken; fince their infamous defign, XXVII. though disclosed in words, had not proceeded to FR. F. .. " action; and to remind them that they were not ac. 200. 46 natives of Campania, or of Tarentum, but of "Rome. That from thence they derived their " origin, and from thence were fent out into colo-" nies, into lands taken from enemies, for the " purpose of increasing population; and that, consequently, whatever duties children owe to parents, these they owed to the Romans, if they had any " remains of natural affection, or any regard for " their mother country. They defired them, there-" fore, to confer on the matter anew; for that, as to 66 the measures which they had inconsiderately men-" tioned, their tendency was to betray the Roman " empire, and to give up the conquest of it to Han-" nibal." Though the confuls, one after the other, reasoned with them in this manner for a long time, yet the ambassadors were not in the least moved. but replied, that "they had nothing new to repre-"fent to the fenate at home, neither had that affem-66 bly grounds for new deliberation, when they either had men to be enlifted, nor money to pay 44 them." The confuls, finding them inflexible, laid the affair before the fenate: and here it excited fuch ferious apprehensions in every mind, that great numbers cried out, that "the ruin of the empire was at hand; that the other colonies would act in "the fame manner; fo would the allies; that all " had conspired to betray the city of Rome to Han-" nibal."

X. The confuls endeavoured to confole and encourage the fenate, telling them, that "the other colonies would maintain their allegiance and duty as heretofore; and that even these which had were from their duty, if ambassadors were tent round among them, instructed to apply reproofs,

BOOK " reproofs, and not intreaties, would be impressed XXVII. " with respect for the sovereign authority." Having received power from the senate to act and manage Y. R. 343. as they should see most conducive to the public B.C. 209. good, they began by founding the dispositions of the other colonies; and then, fummoning their ambaffadors, demanded of them in public, whether they had their contingents of foldiers ready according to the regulation? To this Marcus Sextilius, of Fregellæ, in behalf of the eighteen colonies, made answer, that "the soldiers were ready according to "the regulation; that if a greater number should 66 be required, they would bring them; and, that " whatever else the Roman people should command " or wish, they would perform with zeal and dili-" gence. That they wanted not fufficiency of means, " and had more than a fufficiency of inclination." On this the consuls, after premising that all the praises which themselves could bestow would be inadequate to their merits, unless they were joined by the thanks of the whole body of the senate in full assembly, defired them to accompany them into the fenate-house. The fenate complimented them by a decree conceived in the most honourable terms possible, and then charged the confuls to conduct them into an affembly of the people also, and there, among the many other important fervices which those colonies had performed to them and their ancestors, to make proper mention of this recent instance of their meritorious conduct towards the commonwealth. Even now, and after fo many ages, their names should not be lost in filence, nor should they be defrauded of their due praise: they were these - Signia, Norba, m, Fregellæ, Luceria, Venufia, Saticulum, Brund: Adria, Firma, Ariminum; on the coast of the other sea, Pontia, Pæstum, and Cosa; and in the inland parts, Beneventum, Æsernia, Spoletum, Placentia, and Cremona. Supported by these, the Roman

Roman empire was enabled to stand; and they re- BOOK ceived every mark of gratitude both in the senate, and XXVII. in the affembly of the people. The former ordered, Y.R. 543. that no mention should be made of the other twelve B.C. 200 dependencies, which had refused to furnish their quota for the war, and that the confuls should neither dismiss nor detain their ambassadors, nor hold any communication with them: fuch a tacit proof of displeasure was judged the most suitable to the dignity of the Roman people. While the confuls were buly in expediting the other necessary preparations for the campaign, it was refolved to draw out of the treafury the vicefimary gold, (that is to fay, a fund formed of the twentieth part of the value of flaves enfranchifed,) which was referved for exigencies of the utmost necessity. There was drawn out accordingly, to the amount of four thousand pounds weight of gold. Of this were given to the confuls, to Marcus Marcellus and Publius Sulpicius, proconfuls, and to Lucius Veturius, the prætor, to whom the lots had given the province of Gaul, five hundred pounds each; and besides this, there were given. in particular charge, to the conful Fabius, one hundred pounds of gold to be carried into the citadel of Tarentum. The remainder they employed in making contracts, with ready money, for clothing the army, who were then ferving in Spain, with fo much honour to themselves and to their commander.

XI. It was also resolved, that, before the consuls fet out from the city, they should expiate several prodigies which had happened. On the Alban mount, a flatue of Jupiter, and a tree, it among near the temple: at Oftia, a grove; at Capua, a wall, and the temple of Fortune, and at Sinuessa, a wall and gate, were struck by lightning. Farther it was reported, that the Alban water flowed in a bloody stream; that,

BOOK at Rome, in the cell of the temple of Fors Fortuna, XXVII. an image, which was in the crown of the goddess, fell from her head into her hands: that an ox Y.R. 543. Spoke at Privernum; that a vulture, while the Forum was crowded, flew down into one of the shops; and that, at Sinuessa, an infant was born whose fex was doubtful, fuch as are commonly called in Greek (a language more manageable than ours, particularly in the compounding of words), Androgynes; that a shower of milk fell, and that a boy was born with the head of an elephant. These prodigies were expiated with the larger kinds Orders were given for a supplication to of victims. be performed at all the shrines, and prayers to be offered during one day, for the averting of misfortunes; and a decree passed, that the prætor Caius Hostilius should vow and celebrate the games of Apollo, in like manner as they had, of late years, been vowed and celebrated. At the same time, the conful Quintus Fulvius held an affembly for the election of cenfors. The cenfors chosen were men who had never yet been confuls, Marcus Cornelius Cethegus, and Publius Sempronius Tuditanus. By direction of the fenate the question was proposed to the people, and the people ordered, that thefe, by their censorial authority, should let to farm the lands of Campania. The choosing of the senate was delayed by a dispute between the censors about the nomination of the prince of it: the making the choice had fallen, by lot, to Sempronius; but Cornelius alleged that he ought to observe the practice handed down from their ancestors, which was to appoint as prince, the person who in the list of cenfors stood the first of any then living, and this was

> Titus Manlius Torquatus. Sempronius maintained, that when the gods gave a person the lot of appointing, they gave him at the fame time full freedom of choice: that he would act in this case agreeably to his own judgment, and would name to the honour BOOK contended for, Quintus Fabius Maximus, whom XXVII. he could prove to be the first of the whole Roman Y.R. 543. state, even in Hannibal's opinion. After a long B.C. 200. dispute, his colleague gave up the point, and Sempronius chofe the conful, Quintus Fabius Maximus, prince of the fenate. Then the lift of the new fenate was read, in which eight were left out, among whom was Lucius Cæcilius Metellus, infamous for having, after the defeat at Cannæ, advised the abandonment of Italy. In their review of the equaltrian order also, they censured every one concerned with him; but the number diffraced on that account was very fmall. From all the cavalry of the legions of Cannæ then in Sicily, and their number was great, their horses were taken away. To this they added another punishment in point of time, ordering that the campaigns which those men had ferved on horses given by the public, should not entitle them to release, but that they should serve during ten others on horses of their own. They also searched for, and discovered, a great number, who ought to be ranked in the cavalry, and all of these who had been seventeen years old at the beginning of the war, and had not ferved, they disfranchifed. They then contracted for the repairs of the buildings round the Forum, which had been destroyed by the fire, - feven shops, the shambles, and the royal palace.

XII. Having finished the necessary business at Rome, the confuls fet out for the campaign. Fulvius, first, went forward to Capua; in a few days after, Fabius followed, and he earnestly intreated his colleague in person, and Marcellus by letter, to make the most vigorous efforts to keep Hannibal employed, while he should carry on the siege of Tarentum; observing that, when that city should be taken from the enemy, who was already repulsed BOOK in every quarter, and would then have no place

XXVII. where he could rest, or to which he could retreat for fafety, he would not have even a pretence for Y.R. 543. Staying longer in Italy. He likewise sent an express B.C. 209. Staying longer in Italy. He likewise sent an express becommender of the body of to Rhegium, to the commander of the body of troops, which the conful Lævinus had placed there, to act against the Bruttians, and which confisted of eight thousand men, all accustomed to live by plunder, the greater part of whom had been brought out of Sicily from Agathyrna, as was mentioned above. To these were joined many natives of the country, who deferted from the Bruttians, equally daring, and under equal necessity to dare every thing. ordered this band to be led, first, to ravage the lands of Bruttium, and afterwards to beliege the city These orders they executed, not only with diligence, but with avidity; and after plundering the country, and dispersing the inhabitants, attacked the city with their utmost vigour. Marcellus, incited by his colleague's letter, and also by an opinion which he had himself conceived, that he was the only Roman general able to cope with Hannibal, quitted his winter-quarters as foon as forage could be found, and met him at Canufium. The Carthaginian was, at this time, employed in endeavouring to entice the Canufians to a revolt, but, on hearing of Marcellus's approach, he decamped and retired. The country was open, affording no cover for an ambuscade, for which reason he resolved to draw back into more woody tracts. Marcellus pressed close on his steps, encamped within view of him, and, as foon as the trenches were finished, drew out his legions and offered battle. Hannibal fent out fingle troops of cavalry, and the light spearmen from his infantry, to skirmish with the enemy, but did not think it advisable to risk the issue of a general engagement. was, however, drawn into a contest of that fort which he wished to avoid: for although, by marching away in the night, he gained some ground of BOOK the enemy, yet Marcellus overtook him in an open XXVII. country, and, as he was forming his camp, put a Y.R.543. stop to his works, by attacking the workmen on all B.C. 200. fides. In confequence of this, a pitched battle enfued, in which all the forces, on both fides, were engaged; but night coming on, they separated, without any advantage being gained on either fide. They then hastily, before it grew dark, fortified their camps, at a very little distance from each other. Next day, as foon as light appeared, Marcellus led out his forces to the field; nor did Hannibal decline the contest, but in a long speech exhorted his men to "remember Trasimenus and Cannæ, and "to crush the presumption of the foe, who pressed 66 fo closely on their steps; not suffering them either to march or encamp in quiet, or even to 66 breathe, or look about them. Every day, the " rifing fun, and the Roman army, appeared toge-"ther on the plains. But if the enemy should " once be compelled to quit the field, especially with some loss of blood, they would afterwards . "conduct their operations with less turbulence and "violence." Irritated by fuch expressions, and at the fame time vexed at being continually haraffed on quitting their camp, they began the fight with great fury. The battle was maintained for more than two hours; then, on the Roman side, the right wing and the chosen band, called extraordinaries, began to give ground; on observing which, Marcellus brought up the eighteenth legion to the front. But, while the others were retiring in confusion, and these advancing, with but little alacrity, into their place, the whole line was disordered and in a little time totally broken: at last, fear getting the better of their shame, they fairly turned their In this battle, and the flight which followed, there fell no less than two thousand seven hundred of the Romans and allies; among these four Roman нн 3

B.C. 209.

BOOK Roman centurions, and two military tribunes, Mar-XXVII. cus Licinius and Marcus Fulvius. Four military Y.R. 543. standards were lost by the wing which first fled, and two by the legions which advanced in the place of the flying allies.

> XIII. After the army had retired into the camp, Marcellus reprimanded them in terms fo harsh and bitter, that they felt more from the discourse of their incenfed commander, than from all they had fuffered, in the unfuccessful fight, through the whole day. He faid to them; "as matters have "turned out, I praise and thank the immortal " gods, that the victorious enemy did not affault " our camp itself, while you were hurrying into the " gates, and over the rampart, in fuch utter dif-" may. You would certainly have abandoned "that, through the fame panic that made you " give up the battle. What fright is this? What " terror, what forgetfulness both of your own cha-" racter and that of your adversaries, has at once " feized your minds? Surely they are the fame " enemies, in defeating and pursuing of whom you " fpent the whole of the last summer; who, for some "days past, have fled before you night and day, " while you pressed on their rear; whom, yesterday, " you did not allow either to continue their march, " or to form their camp. I fay nothing of the dvantages on which you ought to pride your-" felves; but will mention what, of itself, ought to " fill you with shame and remorfe: yesterday you " fought it out to the end on equal terms. " alteration has last night, what has this day made? "Have your forces been diminished; have theirs been augmented? I cannot perfuade myfelf that "I am speaking to my own army, or to Roman " foldiers. The arms and appearances of the men " are fuch as usual. But, if you had possessed the " usual spirit, would the enemy have seen your

" backs? Would he have carried off a standard BOOK " from any one company or cohort? Hitherto, XXVII. "he has boafted of putting our legions to the Y.R.543. "fword; you, this day, have been the first who B.C. 200. " have conferred on him the glory of putting a ⁶⁶ Roman army to flight." On this the troops, univerfally, befought him to pardon their behaviour of that day; and entreated him, whenever he pleafed, to make another trial of the courage of his foldiers. "I will try you, foldiers," faid he, "and to-mor-" row will lead you into the field; that in the " character of conquerors, not of vanquished men, " you may obtain the pardon which you defire." He then ordered, that the cohorts which had loft their standards should receive barley for their allowance, and the centurions of the companies whose standards had been lost, he deprived of their fwords; commanding that all, both infantry and cavalry, should be ready under arms on the following day. The affembly was now difmiffed, all acknowledging that the reproofs which they had received were not more fevere than they deferved; for that no person in the Roman army had, that day, behaved like a man, except the general alone, to whom they ought to make atonement, either by their death or by a glorious victory. On the day following they attended according to orders, armed and accoutred. The general then commended them, and faid, that "he would bring forward, into " the first line, those who had fled first the day " before, and the cohorts which had loft their " flandards; that he now gave notice, that it was " incumbent on them to fight and to conquer, and "to exert themselves vigorously, one and all, to " prevent the news of yesterday's slight reaching "Rome, before that of the present day's triumph." They were then ordered to refresh themselves with food, that, in case the fight should last longer than usual, they might have strength to go through

BOOK it. After every thing had been faid and done to XXVII. rouze the courage of the foldiers, they marched out to the field.

B.C. 209.

XIV. When this was told to Hannibal, he faid, " we have to deal with an enemy who can neither " bear good fortune nor bad: if he gets the better, " he purfues the vanquished with presumption and " vehemence; if he is worsted, he renews the contest with the victors." He then ordered the fignal to be founded, and led out his forces. parties fought now with much more vigour than the day before; the Carthaginians struggling maintain the glory acquired yesterday, the Romans to remove their difgrace. On the fide of the Romans, the left wing, and the cohorts which had loft their standards, fought in the front line; while the twentieth legion was drawn up on the right wing. Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, and Caius Claudius Nero, lieutenant-generals, commanded the wings; Marcellus himself took the charge of the centre, that he might animate the men by his presence, and be an immediate witness of their behaviour. On Hannibal's fide, the front line was composed of the Spanish troops, who were the main strength of his army. When the fight had long continued doubtful, Handibal ordered the elephants to be brought up to the van, hoping, by their means, to occasion fear and disorder. At first, they broke the ranks, and by treading down some, and terrifying others, on either fide, fo as to put them to flight, made an opening in the line in one part: and the alarm would probably have fpred farther, had not Caius Decimius Flavus, a military tribune, fnatching the standard of the first band of spearmen, ordered that company to follow him. He then led them to the fpot where the elephants were throwing all into confusion, with directions to discharge their javelins at them.

them. Every weapon took place, for there was no BOOK difficulty in hitting, at a small distance, bodies of such XXVII. huge bulk, especially as they were crowded close Y.R.543. together. But though they were not all of them B.C.209. wounded, yet those, in whose flesh the javelins stuck, as they are creatures whose motions cannot be depended on, betaking themselves to slight, drove back even those that were unhurt. And now, not any particular company alone, but every foldier who could come up with the retreating elephants, with all his might hurled javelins at them. Thus attacked, the more violently did the animals rush upon their owners, and made so much the greater carnage of them, than they had made of the enemy, as one of them, when frightened or hurt, is hurried on more forcibly than he could be driven by the manager fitting on his back. While the enemy's line was in this great disorder, in consequence of those beasts breaking through it, the Romans made a brisk onset, and without much opposition from troops so scattered and confused, drove them off the ground. cellus ordered his cavalry to charge them as they fled, and the pursuit did not cease, until they were driven, in consternation, into their camp: for besides other circumstances which caused terror and tumult, two elephants had fallen in the very entrance of the gate, fo that the men were obliged to make their way over the trench and rampart. Here the slaughter of the enemy was the greatest. There were killed no less than eight thousand men, and five elephants. Nor did the Romans gain the victory without loss of blood: of the two legions, about one thousand feven hundred were killed, and of the allies above one thousand three hundred. Great numbers, both of Romans and allies, were wounded. In the following night Hannibal decamped, and though Marcellus wished to pursue him, he was prevented by his wounded, which were in great number. who were fent to observe his march, brought intelligence,

474

BOOK gence, next day, that Hannibal had taken the road XXVII. towards Bruttium.

Y.R.543. B.C. 200.

XV. About the fame time, the high war. Lucanians, and Volscians surrendered themterves to the conful Quintus Fulvius, delivering up Hannibal's garrisons which they had in their cities, and were mildly received by the conful, with only a verbal reproof for their past errors. Hopes of similar gentle treatment were held out to the Bruttians also, through two brothers, Virius and Pactius, of the mest illustrious family of any in that nation, who came to request the same terms of capitulation which were granted to the Lucanians. The other conful, Quintus Fabius, took by affault, Manduria, a town in the territory of Sallentum. Here he made four thousand prisoners, and gained much booty of other kinds. Proceeding thence to Tarentum, he pitched his camp at the very mouth of the harbour. the ships, which Livius had kept here for the purpose of protecting convoys, he loaded part with machines and implements fit for affailing walls, the rest he furnished with engines, stones, and missile weapons of every kind; the store-ships also, not confining himself to such only as were moved by oars, he fitted out in the same manner, in order that some might bring out the machines and ladders to the. walls, while the others, from their ships at some distance, should annoy, with missile weapons, the men employed in defending them. These ships were thus fitted up and prepared, for the purpose of an attack on that fide of the city which is washed by the open sea, which was now clear of the enemy; for the Carthaginian fleet had failed over to Corcyra, at the time when Philip was preparing to attack the Ætolians. Meanwhile, the party which carried on the fiege of Caulon in Bruttium, hearing of Hannibal's approach, and fearful of being overpowered, retired to an eminence, which, though it fecured 4 them from an immediate attack, was destitute of BOOK every other convenience. In the profecution of the XXVII. fiege of Tarentum, Fabius received very great af- Y.R.543fiftance towards the accomplishment of that im- B.C.209. portant business, from an incident trivial in appearance: the Tarentines had in the city a party of Bruttians, given to them by Hannibal, and the commander of this party was desperately in love with a young woman, whose brother was in the army of the conful Fabius. This man, being informed, by a letter from his fifter, of her new acquaintance with a stranger of so great wealth, and fo highly honoured among his countrymen, conceived hopes that, by means of his fifter, her lover might be brought into any scheme; and this project he communicated to the conful: his reasoning appeared not ill-founded, and he was ordered to go as a deferter into Tarentum. Here being introduced by his fifter to the notice of the commander, he began by artfully founding his disposition, and having fatisfied himself that his temper was as fickle as he could wish, by the aid of female blandishments he prevailed on him to betray the post, of which he commanded the guard. When both the method and the time for the execution of this defign were fettled, the foldier was let out of the town privately, through the intervals between the guards, and related to the conful what had been done, and what was further intended. At the first watch, Fabius, after giving proper directions to the troops in the citadel, and to those who had the guard of the harbour, went himself quite round the harbour, and sat down, in concealment, on the fide of the city facing the east. The trumpets then began to found at once, from the citadel, from the port, and from the ships which had been brought to the shore, on the fide next to the open sea. At the same time a shout was raifed, and a prodigious tumult purpofely made, on every fide where there was very little danger.

Mean-

Y.R.543.

BOOK Meanwhile the conful kept his men quiet and filent. XXVII. Democrates, therefore, who had formerly commanded the fleet, and who happened now to command there, B.C. 200. perceiving every thing near him quiet, while other parts resounded with tumult and shouting like that of a city stormed, fearful lest, while he hesitated, the conful might force a passage, and march in his troops, carried off his party to the citadel, because the most alarming noise proceeded from that quarter. Fabius, from the length of time, and likewise from the filence which prevailed, (for where, a little before, there was an uproar among the men roufing each other, and calling to arms, now not a word was heard,) imagined that the guard was withdrawn; he therefore ordered the ladders to be brought up to that part of the wall, where, according to the information of the contriver of the plot, the cohort of Bruttians held the guard. In this place, favoured and affifted by the Bruttians, the Romans first gained possession of the wall, over which they climbed into the city; and then the nearest gate was broken open, that the troops might march through in a body. These entering the town a little before day, raised a shout, and, without meeting any one in arms, proceeded to the Forum, having drawn on themfelves the attention of the combatants in every quarter, whether at the citadel or the harbour.

> XVI. At the entrance of the Forum, a vigorous opposition was made, but it was not persevered in. A Tarentine was no match for a Roman, either in spirit, in arms, in warlike skill, nor yet in vigour or bodily strength. They only discharged their javelins, and then scarcely waiting till the fight began, turned their backs; and, as they were acquainted with the streets of the city, ran different ways to their own houses, or those of their friends. of their commanders, Nico and Democrates, fell, fighting courageously. Philomenus, who had been the author of the plot for betraying the city to BOOK Hannibal, rode away from the fight at full speed; XXVII. his horse was not long after seen, straying through Y.R.543. the city without a rider, but his body was never B.C. 209. found, and the general opinion was, that he fell from his horse into an open well. Carthalo, as he was coming to the conful unarmed, to remind him of their fathers being connected by an intercourse of hospitality, was flain by a soldier who met him in the way. The rest were put to the sword without distinction, armed and unarmed, Carthaginians and Tarentines alike. Many even of the Bruttians were killed, either through mistake, or through the inveterate hatred borne towards them by the Romans, or with defign to discountenance the report of the place being betrayed, and that it might rather appear to have been taken by force of arms. After this carnage, the victors proceeded, in feveral parties, to plunder the city. We are told that there were taken here thirty thousand perfons in a state of servitude, a vast quantity of silver wrought and coined, eighty-feven thousand pounds weight of gold, together with statues and pictures in fuch numbers, as almost to rival the decorations of Syracuse. But Fabius, with more greatness of mind than was shewn by Marcellus, refrained from meddling with booty of that fort; and when his fecretary asked him what he would have done with the statues of their gods, which were of gigantic fize, and habited like warriors, he ordered him to "let the Tarentines keep their angry gods to "themselves." Then the wall, which separated the citadel from the town, was demolished and rased. Amid these transactions, Hannibal, having made prisoners the party employed in the siege of Caulon, who capitulated, hearing of the fiege of Tarentum, marched night and day with all expedition to relieve it: but while he was hastening thither, he received the news of its being taken.

BOOK On this, he observed, "the Romans, too, have their XXVII. "Hannibal; we have lost Tarentum through the fame arts by which we acquired it." That he Y.R.543. might not, however, feem to have turned back as B.C.209. in flight, he encamped on the spot where he had halted, about five miles from the city; and, after staying there a few days, retreated to Metapontum. From hence he fent to Tarentum two Metapontines, with letters from the principal men in that flate to Fabius, to receive his promife of impunity for what was past, on condition of their delivering Metapontum and the Carthaginian garrison into his hands. Fabius, supposing the offer to be made with fincerity, appointed a day on which he would come to Metapontum, and gave letters in answer, which were delivered to Hannibal, who, overjoyed at the fuccess of his stratagem, and at finding that even Fabius was not proof against artifice, formed an ambuscade at a small distance from Metapontum. As Fabius was taking the auspices, previous to his departure from Tarentum, the birds repeatedly refused the favourable figns; also, when he confulted the gods by facrifice, the aruspex warned him to beware of treachery and plots. As he did not come on the appointed day, the two Metapontines were fent back, to remove any scruple that retarded him, but being fuddenly feized, and dreading an examination by torture, they disclosed the whole plot.

> XVII. In Spain, in the beginning of the fummer, there came over to Scipio, who had fpent all the preceding winter in conciliating the affections of the barbarians, partly by prefents, and partly by fend-ing home their hostages and prisoners, a person named Edesco, a distinguished commander among the Spaniards. This man's wife and children were in the hands of the Romans; but, besides this motive, he was also actuated by that almost unaccountable countable propension which had brought over all BOOK Spain from the Carthaginian interest to that of the XXVII. Romans. Led by the fame motive, Indibilis and Y.R.543. Mandonius, unquestionably the two first men in B.C.209. Spain, with the whole body of their countrymen, deferted Hasdrubal, and withdrew to an eminence overlooking his camp, from whence, along a continued ridge of hills, they could retire with fafety to When Hafdrubal law the enemy's the Romans. strength increasing by fuch large accessions, while his own was daily diminished, and would probably, unless by a bold effort he effected something, continue to decay, in the same manner as it had begun, he resolved to bring on a battle as soon as possible. Scipio was even more defirous of an engagement: as well because his hopes were strong, in consequence of the fuccess which had hitherto attended his affairs, as because he wished to engage with a fingle general and his forces, rather than with all together, which he would perhaps be forced to do. were they to unite. However, should he be under a necessity of fighting more than one army at once. he had taken a judicious method to augment his strength: for, perceiving that there would be no employment for his marine, as the coast of Spain was entirely clear of any Carthaginian fleet, he hauled up the ships on land at Tarraco, and joined the marines to his land forces. As to arms for them, he had abundance, between those taken in Carthage, and those which had been afterwards made by the great number of workmen whom he employed. With this force, Scipio, in the beginning of spring, by which time he was rejoined by Lælius, who had returned from Rome, and without whom he undertook no enterprise of any extraordinary moment, fet out from Tarraco, and advanced towards the enemy. On his march, during which he found every place well affected, the allies shewing him all respect, and escorting him as he passed through each

Y.R.543. B.C. 209

BOOK each of their states, he was met by Indibilis and XXVII. Mandonius, with their armies. Indibilis spoke for both, not with the ignorance and temerity of a barbarian, but with a modest gravity, appearing rather to apologize for their changing fides, as a measure of necessity, than to boast of it, as if it had been greedily embraced on the first opportunity; for "he knew," he faid, "that the term deferter was " deemed dishonourable by a man's old affociates, " and held in fuspicion by the new. Nor did he " blame men for this manner of thinking; provided " only, that the merits of the case, and not the " mere name, were made the grounds of this double " aversion." He then enumerated his services to the Carthaginian generals; and, on the other hand, their avarice, tyranny, and ill-treatment of every kind heaped on him and his countrymen. "For these rea-" fons," he faid, "his body only had, hitherto, been " on their fide; his mind had long been on that " fide where, he believed, that respect was paid to " laws divine and human. To the gods themselves, " people have recourse with supplications for redress, when they can no longer endure the violence and " injustice of men. He intreated Scipio not to con-" fider their conduct as deserving either punishment " or reward; but to form his judgment on a trial " of them from that day forward; and by that " standard to estimate the recompence which they " might hereafter be thought to deserve." The Roman answered, that he would comply with their defire in every particular; and would not confider them in the light of deferters, because they had not thought themselves bound to adhere to such an alliance, when the other party scrupled not to violate every obligation divine and human. Then their wives and children, being brought into the affembly, were restored to them, and received with tears of joy. That day they were entertained in lodgings prepared for them; and, on the next, the terms of affociation affeciation were ratified, and they were dismissed to BOOK bring up their forces; afterwards they encamped in XXVII. conjunction with the Romans, until they conducted them to the fpot where the enemy lay.

XVIII. The nearest army of the Carthaginians was that commanded by Hasdrubal, which lay near the city of Bæcula. In the front of this camp he had posted advanced guards of cavalry. On these, the Roman light infantry, the front rank, and those who composed the van guard, instantly, as they arrived, and without waiting to choose ground for a camp, made an attack, and with fuch apparent contempt, as plainly demonstrated what degree of spirit each party possessed. The cavalry were driven within their works, whither they fled in confusion, pressed almost to the very gates. The action of that day having only whetted their ardour for a contest, the Romans pitched their camp. Hafdrubal, during the night, drew back his army to a hill, the fummit of which was spread out into a level plain; on the rear of the hill was a river, and on the front and on either fide it was encircled by a kind of steep bank: at some distance below this, lay another plain, floping downwards, the circumference of which was likewise bounded by another bank of equally difficult ascent. Into this lower plain, Hasdrubal, next day, on feeing the enemy's line formed in front of their camp, fent down his Numidian cavalry, and the light-armed Balearians and Africans. Scipio, riding round the companies and battalions, defired them to observe, that "the enemy, re-" nouncing at once all hope of being able to oppose "them on plain ground, endeavoured to fecure "themselves on hills; waiting within fight, and " confiding in the strength of their posts, not in "their valour and their arms. But Roman foldiers " had mounted the higher defences of Carthage. " Neither hills, nor a citadel, nor the sea itself had " stopped BOOK " stopped the progress of their arms. Those heights, B.C. 209.

XXVII. " which the enemy had feized, would answer no " other purpose than that of compelling them, in Y.R.543. " their flight, to leap down craggs and precipices: " but he would prevent their escaping, even in that Accordingly, he gave orders to two cohorts, that one of them should secure the entrance of the valley, through which the river ran; and that the other should block up the road, which led from the city into the country, across the declivity of the hill. He then put himself at the head of the light troops, which had, the day before, beaten the enemy's advanced guards, and led them against the light-armed forces posted on the brink of the lower descent. For some time they proceeded over rough ground, without meeting any other obstacle than the difficulty of the way; afterwards, when they came within reach, vast quantities of weapons of every fort were poured down upon them; while, on their fide, not only the foldiers, but a multitude of fervants mixed among the troops, affailed the enemy with stones, which they found every where scattered, and which, in general, were of fuch a fize as that they could be thrown by the hand. But, though the afcent was difficult, and they were almost overwhelmed with darts and stones, yet, through the skill which they had acquired by practice in climbing walls, and the obstinacy of their courage, the foremost gained the fummit. When they got upon ground that was any way level, and where they could stand with firm footing, they soon beat back the enemy; who, though light and fit for skirmishing, and able enough to defend themselves at a distance, while an uncertain kind of fight was waged with missive weapons, yet, when the matter came to close fighting, were quite deficient in steadiness; fo that they were driven with great flaughter into the line of troops posted on the higher eminence. On this, Scipio, ordering the conquerors to press forward forward against their centre, divided the rest of the BOOK forces with Lælius, whom he ordered to go round XXVII. the hill to the right, entil he should find a gentler Y.R.543. afcent, while he himself, making a small circuit to B.C. 209. the left, charged the enemy in flank. This, at once, threw their line into disorder, though they attempted to change the position of their wings, and to face about their ranks towards the feveral shouts, which affailed their ears from every quarter. During this confusion, Lælius also came up, and the enemy, by retreating, through fear of being wounded from behind, broke their front line, and left an opening for the Roman centre, who never could have made their way up against ground fo disadvantageous, had the ranks remained entire, and the elephants kept their posts in the front of the battalions. While numbers were flain in every quarter, Scipio, who with his left wing had charged the right of the enemy, continued the attack with the greatest fury against their naked flank. now the Carthaginians had not even a paffage open for flight; for the Roman detachments had taken possession of the roads both on the right and left; add to this, that their commander and principal officers, in endeavouring to make their escape, filled up the gate of the camp, while the diforderly rout of the frightened elephants were as terrible to them as were the enemy. There were flain therefore not less than eight thousand men.

XIX. Hasdrubal had, before the battle, hastily fent off his treasure; and now, forwarding the elephants, he collected the flying troops, directing his course along the river Tagus, toward the Pyrenees. Scipio took possession of the Carthaginian camp, and having bestowed on the soldiers all the booty, except the persons of free condition, he found, on taking an account of the prisoners, ten thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Of these,

Y.R.543. B.C. 209.

BOOK he fent home all the Spaniards without ranfom, the XXVII. Africans he ordered the quæstor to sell. On this, the multitude of Spaniards who stood around, both those who had formerly furrendered, and those taken the day before, unanimously faluted him by the title of king. But Scipio, ordering the crier to command filence, told them, that " to him the " highest title was that of general, which his " foldiers had conferred upon him. That the title " of king, in other places highly respected, was, " at Rome, deemed odious. They might, indeed, within their own breafts, judge of him as pos-" fessing the spirit of a king, if they deemed that "the most honourable perfection in a human " mind, but they must refrain from the application " of the name." Even these barbarians were fenfibly affected by the greatness of his mind, that could look down contemptuously on a title, which from the rest of mankind attracts wonder and admiration. He then distributed presents among the petty princes and chieftains of the Spaniards, defiring Indibilis to choose, out of the great number of horses taken, three hundred, such as he liked. While the quæstor, in pursuance of the general's order, was felling off the Africans, he observed among them a boy of extraordinary beauty; and, hearing that he was of royal blood, he fent him to Scipio. Scipio, asking him, "who, and of what country he was; and why, at that " early age, he had been found in a camp?" He told him, that " he was a Numidian, called " by his countrymen Massiva; that being left " an orphan, by the death of his father, he was deducated in the family of his maternal grand-" father, Gala, King of Numidia. That he had 66 come over into Spain with his uncle Masi-" nissa, who had lately brought a body of cavalry to the affiftance of the Carthaginians. That he " had never before been in a battle, having been

" prohibited by Masinissa on account of his youth; BOOK "but that, on the day of the engagement with the XXVII. "Romans, he had privately taken a horse and arms, Komans, he had privately taken a notice that Y.R.543, and, unknown to his uncle, gone out into the B.C. 209. "field, where by his horse falling he was thrown to 66 the ground, and made a prisoner by the Ro-Scipio, ordering the boy to be taken care of, finished what business was to be done at the tribunal; then, retiring into his pavilion, he called the youth, and asked him, whether he wished to return to Masinissa? To which the other, his eyes fuffuled with tears of joy, replied, that above all things it was what he wished. He then gave as presents to him, a gold ring, a vest with a broad purple border, a Spanish cloak with a golden clasp, likewise a horse fully accoutred; and, ordering a party of horsemen to escort him as far as he chose, fent him away.

XX. He then held a council, to settle a plan of operations; when many advised him, without delay, to go in pursuit of Hasdrubal: but such a step he thought too hazardous, lest Hasdrubal, son of Gisgo, and Mago should unite their forces with those of that commander. Contenting himself, therefore, with sending some troops to occupy the passes of the Pyrenees, he passed the remainder of the summer in receiving the submissions of the Spanish states. many days after the battle fought at Bæcula, when Scipio, on his return to Tarraco, had just got clear of the pass of Castulo, the two generals, from the Farther Spain, Haldrubal, fon of Gilgo, and Mago, ioined Hasdrubal - a reinforcement too late, the battle being loft: but their coming was very feafonable in another respect, as it gave him the affistance of their counsel, respecting the measures to be taken for the farther profecution of the war. On this occafion, when they compared accounts of the dispositions of the Spaniards in each of their feveral provinces,

Y.R.543. B.C. 209.

BOOK vinces, Hasdrubal, son of Gisgo, alone, made a favourable report; giving his opinion, that the remote tract of Spain, which lies on the ocean and about Gades, was, as yet, unacquainted with the Romans, and therefore sufficiently well affected to the Carthaginians. The other Hasdrubal and Mago agreed in pronouncing, that "the affections of all, 66 both in their public and private capacities, were " attached to Scipio by the kind treatment which "he gave them; and that there would be no end " of defertions, until all the Spanish soldiers were " either removed into the remotest parts of Spain, " or carried away into Gaul. Therefore, though the "Carthaginian fenate had passed no order for the " purpose, yet it was necessary that Hasdrubal " should go into Italy, where the principal stress " of the war lay, and where the final decision of " it must be expected; in order, at the same time, " to carry away all the Spanish soldiers out of Spain, " and out of the way of hearing the name of Scipio: " that the Carthaginian army, being greatly reduced, 46 as well by defertions as by the late unfortunate bat-"tle, should be filled up with Spanish recruits: that " Mago, giving up his forces to Hasdrubal, son of "Gifgo, should go over in person to the Balearick " islands, with a large fum of money, to hire auxi-" liaries: that Haidrubal, fon of Gifgo, should, " with the remainder, retire into Lusitania, and by 66 no means come to an engagement with the "Romans: that out of all their effective horsemen, " a body of three thousand cavalry should be " made up for Masinissa, to make excursions " through what they called Hither Spain, fuccour " their allies, and carry depredations through "the towns and lands of the enemy." Having determined on these measures, the commanders feparated, to put their refolves in exeution. Such were the transactions of this year in Spain. At Rome, the reputation of Scipio rose higher every day.

day. The taking of Tarentum, though effected by BOOK artifice rather than by courage, yet gave some XXVII. degree of glory to Fabius. The lustre of Fulvius's Y.R. 543. character began to fade. Marcellus was even B.C. 209. spoken of with displeasure, because, besides the failure in his first battle, he had in the middle of fummer, while Hannibal was carrying his excurfions through various parts of Italy, drawn off his army to Venusia, to lodge them in houses. He had a bitter enemy in Caius Publius Bibulus, a plebeian tribune: this man, ever fince the battle which proved unfortunate, had, in frequent harangues, represented Claudius in a dishonourable light, endeavouring to render him odious to the commons; and he now proposed to deprive him of the command. The friends of Claudius nevertheless procured an order, that Marcellus, leaving at Venusia a lieutenant-general, should come home to Rome, to clear himself of those charges, on which his enemies founded the resolutions which they proposed; and that, during his absence, no step should be taken towards diveiting him of the command. It fo happened that Marcellus came to Rome, to rescue his character from disgrace, and the conful Quintus Fulvius to hold the elections, at the fame time.

XXI. THE business respecting Marcellus's commission was debated in the Flaminian circus, amidst a vast concourse of plebeians, and people of all ranks. The tribine of the commons brought forward heavy charges, not only against Marcellus, but against the whole body of the nobles. "their treacherous and dilatory conduct," he faid, " it was owing, that Hannibal now held poffession " of Italy, as his province, for the tenth year, and 56 passed more of his life there than in Carthage. "The Roman people now enjoyed the fruits of " continuing Marcellus in command:

Y.R.543. B.C. 209.

BOOK " after being twice routed, was spending the summer XXVII. "at Venusia, and dwelling in houses instead of the " camp." These, and such like invectives of the tribune, Marcellus fo thoroughly refuted, by a recital of the fervices which he had performed, that not only the question concerning the annulling of his commission was negatived, but, on the day following, every one of the centuries, with the greatest unanimity, concurred in electing him conful. The colleague joined with him, was Titus Quintius Crispinus, then a prætor. Next day were elected prætors, Publius Licinius Crassus Dives, then chief pontiss, Publius Licinius Varus, Sextus Julius Cæfar, Quintus Claudius Hamen. During the very time of the elections, the public were much disturbed with apprehensions of a revolt in Etruria. That some scheme of that kind had been set on foot by the Arretians was asferted in a letter of Caius Calpurnius, who, in the character of proprætor, held the government of that province. Wherefore Marcellus, conful elect, was immediately dispatched thither, with orders to enquire into the affair, and, if he should see occafion, to fend for his army, and remove the war from Apulia to Etruria. The fear of this gave the Etrurians such a check, as kept them quiet. Ambassadors from the Tarentines came to solicit a treaty of peace, requesting that they might be allowed to live in freedom under their own laws; but the fenate defired them to come again, when the conful Fabius would have returned to Rome. Both the Roman and plebeian games were this year repeated for one day. The curule ædiles were Lucius Cornelius Caudinus, and Servius Sulpicius Galba; the plebeian, Caius Servilius and Quintus Cæcilius Metellus. Many people infifted that Servilius could not legally have held the office of tribune, nor could now hold that of ædile, because it was well known that his father, who, for ten years, was supposed to have been killed by the Boians near Mutina, when Triumvir

Triumvir for the distribution of lands, was still liv- BOOK ing, and in the hands of the enemy.

XXII. In the eleventh year of the Punic war Y.R. 544. commenced the confulate of Marcus Marcellus, a B.C. 208. fifth time, (reckoning the confulfhip, which, because of an irregularity in the election, he did not hold,) and Titus Quintius Crifpinus. It was decreed, that both the confuls should be employed in Italy, as their province; and that out of the two consular armies of the preceding year, with a third, which was at Venusia, and had been under the command of Marcellus, the confuls were to choose whatever two they liked; and the third was to be affigned to the commander, to whose lot the province of Tarentum and Sallentum should fall. The other provinces were distributed in this manner: with regard to the prætors, the city jurisdiction was assigned to Publins Licinius Varus; the foreign, with fuch other employment as the fenate should direct, to Publius Licinius Crassus, chief pontiff; Sicily to Sextus Julius Cæsar, and Tarentum to Quintus Claudius flamen. Quintus Fulvius Flaccus was continued in command for the year, and ordered, with one legion, to hold the government of the province of Capua, which had been held by Titus Quintius, when prætor. Caius Hostilius Tubulus was likewife continued, that, as proprætor, he might fucceed Caius Calpurnius in the command of the two legions in Etruria; and Lucius Veturius Philo was continued, that he might, in quality of proprætor, retain the government of his prefent province of Gaul, with the same two legions which he had there when prætor. With regard to Caius Aurunculeius, who, in his prætorship, had, with two legions, held the government of the province of Sardinia, the senate passed a decree in the same terms with that respecting Lucius Veturius, but, for the defence of that province, an additional force

BOOK was affigned him of fifty ships of war, which Scipio XXVII. was to send from Spain. The business of continuing all these officers in command was laid before an Y.R. 544. affembly of the people. To Publius Scipio and Marcus Silanus, their present province of Spain, and the armies at present with them, were decreed for the year. An order was fent to Scipio, that, out of eighty ships which he then had, - some brought with him from Italy, some taken at Carthage, - he should send sifty over to Sardinia; because a report prevailed that great naval preparations were going on at Carthage, where the intention was to overspread the whole coasts of Italy, Sicily, and Sardinia with a fleet of two hundred fail. business of Sicily was divided thus: the troops of Cannæ were given to Sextus Cæsar; Marcus Valerius Lævinus (for he also was continued in authority) was to have the fleet of feventy ships, which lay on the coast of that island. To these were joined the thirty ships which had been at Tarentum the year before; and with this fleet of one hundred fail, if he thought proper, he was to pass over and make depredations on Africa. Publius Sulpicius, alfo, was continued in command for the year, that he might hold the province of Macedonia and Greece, with the fame fleet which he had before. With respect to the two legions which remained in the city of Rome, no alteration was made. was given for the confuls to raise recruits, to complete the troops wherein there was any deficiency Twenty-one legions were employed of numbers. this year in the fervice of the Roman empire. A charge was given to Publius Licinius Varus. city prætor, to repair thirty old ships of war, which lay at Offia,, and to furnish twenty new ones, with their full complement of men, that he might have a fleet of fifty fail to guard the sea coasts in the neighbourhood of Rome. Caius Calpurnius was forbidden to remove his army from Arretium, before before the arrival of his fuccessor. Both he and BOOK Tubero were ordered to be particularly watch- XXVII. ful on that fide, left any new schemes might be formed.

XXIII. The prætors went to the provinces, but the confuls were detained by bufiness respecting religion; for they could not readily effect the expiation of feveral prodigies which had been reported. From Campania, accounts were brought, that two temples at Capua, those of Fortune and Mars, and feveral tombs, were struck by lightning; and at Cumæ, mice gnawed some gold in the temple of Jupiter, fo apt is superstitious weakness to introduce the deities into the most trivial occurrences; that at Casinum, a very large swarm of bees settled in the Forum; at Oftia, a wall and gate were ftruck by lightning; at Cære, a vulture flew into the temple of Jupiter; and that at Vulfinii blood flowed from a lake. On account of these portents, there was a fupplication performed of one day's continuance. During many fuccessive ones, facrifices were offered of victims of the larger kinds, and yet no favourable omens appeared, nor, for a long time, was there any indication of the gods becoming propitious. The baneful events, thus forboded, affected not immediately the fafety of the state, but fell on the persons of the consuls. The Apollinarian games had been first celebrated by the city prætor, Cornelius Sulla, in the confulate of Quintus Fulvius, and Appius Claudius; and, thenceforward, all the city prætors, in fuccession, had performed them; but they vowed them only for one year, and fixed no particular day for their observance. This year, a grievous epidemic diforder fell both on the oity and country; however, the fickness was rather tedious than mortal. On account of this malady, a supplication was performed in all the streets of Rome, the city prætor.

BOOK prætor, Publius Licinius Varus, being at the fame XXVII. time ordered to propose to the people to enact a law, Y.R.544. bration of those games on a stated day. Accordingly he himself first engaged for it, holding the games on the third day of the nones of July, which day has ever fince been observed as an anniversary festival.

> XXIV. The rumours concerning the Arretians grew every day more and more alarming, and greatly increased the anxiety of the senate; where-fore orders were dispatched to Caius Hostilius, not to defer taking hostages from that people; and Caius Terentius Varro was fent with a commisfion to receive them from him, and conduct them to Rome. On his arrival, Hostilius immediately ordered one legion, which was encamped before the gates, to march into the city; and then, having posted guards in proper places, he summoned the fenate to attend him in the Forum, and made a demand of hostages. The senate requested two days time to confider of the matter; but he infifted that they should give them instantly, or he would, next day, take all the children of the fenators. He then directed all the military tribunes, præfects of the allies, and centurions, to guard the gates carefully, that no one might go out of the city in the night. This was not performed with proper care and diligence; for, before the guards were posted at the gates, or night came on, feven principal fenators made their escape with their children. At the first light, on the day following, the fenate being fummoned into the Forum, they were missed, and their property was fold. From the rest of the senators, one hundred and twenty hostages were received, who were their own children, and they were delivered to Caius Terentius to be conducted to Rome. He reprefented every thing to the fenate, in fuch a light as greatly increased their suspicions: wherefore, as BOOK if the hostile intentions of the Etrurians were no XXVII. longer to be doubted, an order was given to Caius Y.R.544. Terentius himself, to lead one of the city legions to B.C. 208. Arretium, and to keep it there, as a garrison to the city. It was at the fame time determined that Caius Hostilius, with the rest of the troops, should make a circuit through the whole province; that those who wished to excite disturbances might have no opportunity of putting their defigns in execution. When Caius Terentius, with the legion, arrived at Arretium, and demanded from the magistrates the keys of the gates, they told him that they were not to be found; but he, believing rather that they had been -put out of the way through some evil design, than lost through negligence, put on new locks, making use of every precaution to keep all things fully under his own power. He earnestly cautioned Hostilius not to expect to retain the Etrurians in quiet by any other means than by putting it out of their power to stir.

XXV. About this time, the business of the Tarentines occasioned a warm debate in the senate. where Fabius was present, exerting himself in favour of those whom he had subdued by arms, while others spoke of them with much asperity, charging them as equal in guilt and deferving equal punishment with the Campanians. The fenate resolved, conformably to the opinion of Manius Acilius, that the town should be secured by a garrison, and all the Tarentines confined within the walls, and that the business should be taken under confideration at a future time, and when Italy should be in a state of greater tranquillity: The case of Marcus Livius, governor of the citadel of Tarentum, was also debated with no less warmth: fome advised to pass a vote of censure on him, because that, in consequence of his indolence, Tarentum

BOOK rentum had been betrayed to the enemy; while XXVII. others thought him deserving of reward, for having defended the citadel for five years, and for having, Y.R. 544. fingly, been the principal cause of the recovery of Tarentum. Moderate people affirmed, that the cognizance of his conduct belonged to the cenfors, not to the fenate; and of this opinion was Fabius; nevertheless adding - "Livius was, no doubt, the cause " of Tarentum being recovered, as his friends have " fo often boasted in the senate; but it should be " borne in mind that it could not have been reco-" vered, if it had not been loft." The conful, Titus Quintius Crifpinus, marched with a reinforcement into Lucania, to join the army formerly commanded by Quintus Fulvius Flaccus. Marcellus was detained by feveral obstacles respecting religion, which occurred, in quick fuccession, to disturb his mind: one of which was, that, having in the battle with the Gauls at Clastidium vowed a temple to Honour and Virtue, he had been hindered, by the pontiffs, from dedicating it; for they infifted, that one shrine could not, with propriety, be consecrated to more than one deity; because, if it should be struck with lightning, or any kind of prodigy happen in it, the expiation would be difficult, as it could not be determined to which of the deities facrifice ought to be made; for one victim could not, properly, be offered to two divinities, unless they were known to be two to whom fuch victim must be acceptable. Wherefore a feparate temple was erected to Virtue. and the work pushed forward with haste; nevertheless these temples were not dedicated by him. length he fet out, with a number of recruits, to join the army, which he had left the year before at Venusia. Crispinus, observing the great degree of fame which the taking of Tarentum had procured to Marcellus, prepared to lay siege to Locri in Bruttium, fending to Sicily for engines and machines οf of all forts, and calling over a fleet from thence, BOOK to attack that quarter of the city which stretched XXVII. down to the fea. But he laid aside his design of Y.R. 544. the fiege, because Hannibal had advanced to Licinium; B.C. 208. he heard, too, that his colleague had led out his army from Venusia, which made him wish to unite their forces. Crispinus therefore withdrew from Bruttium into Apulia, and the two confuls fat down in separate camps, distant from each other less than three miles, between Venusia and Bantia. Hannibal also returned into the same country, as soon as he had faved Locri from a fiege. And now the confuls, being both impatient for action, offered battle almost every day; not doubting but that, if the enemy would hazard an engagement with the two confular armies united, they might effectually put an end to the war.

XXVI. As Hannibal, of the two battles which he had fought with Marcellus the year before, had gained one and lost the other, he might now, in case of an engagement with the same antagonist, find reasonable grounds both of hope and fear; but he could, by no means, believe himself equal to a contest with the two consuls together. Applying himfelf, therefore, wholly to his old artifices, he watched an opportunity for an ambuscade. However, several skirmishes were fought between the camps with various fuccess, and the confuls began to think that the fummer might be spun out in this manner. They were of opinion, however, that the fiege of Locri might, nevertheless, be prosecuted; and they wrote to Lucius Cincius to come over, with the fleet, from Sicily to that place; and, to carry on the fiege on the land fide, they ordered half the troops in garrison at Tarentum to march thither. Hannibal, having received previous intimation from some Thurians of these intended measures, sent a party to lie in ambush on the road from Tarentum. There, under the

hill

BOOK hill of Petellia, three thousand horsemen and two thou-XXVII fand foot were placed in concealment; and the Romans, marching carelessly, without having examined Y.R.544. the road, fell into the fnare, where no less than two thousand foldiers were killed, and about twelve hundred taken prisoners: the rest slying different ways, through the fields and woods, returned to Tarentum. Between the Roman and Carthaginian camps. stood a hill, interspersed with trees, which neither party at first had occupied, because the Romans knew not the nature of the ground on the fide which faced the camp of the enemy, and Hannibal had iudged it to be better fitted for an ambush than for a camp: accordingly he fent thither, for the purpose, a strong detachment of Numidians, whom he concealed in the middle of a thicket; not one of whom stirred from his post in the day, lest either their arms or themselves might be observed from a There ran a general murmur through the Roman camp, that this hill ought to be feized, and fecured by a fort, lest, if Hannibal should get possession of it, they should have the enemy, as it were, over their heads. The observation struck Marcellus, and he faid to his colleage, "Why not "go ourselves with a few horsemen, and take a "view of the place? After examining the matter " with our own eyes, we shall be able to judge with " more certainty." Crispinus assenting, they proceeded to the spot, attended by two hundred and twenty horsemen, of whom forty were Fregellans, the rest Etrurians: they were accompanied by two military tribunes, Marcus Marcellus, the conful's fon, and Aulus Manlius, and by two præfects of the allies, Lucius Arennius and Marcus Aulius. Some writers have recorded, that the conful Marcellus offered facrifice on that day, and that, on the first victim being slain, the liver was found without its head: in the fetond, all the usual parts appeared, but there was a swelling observed on the head of the the liver; the aruspex also observing, that, in the BOOK fecond case, the entrails, being imperfect and foul, XXVII. afforded no very happy prefages.

Y.R.544. B.C. 208.

XXVII. But the conful Marcellus was possessed with fuch a passionate desire for a trial of strength with Hannibal, that he never thought his own camp close enough to his; and on this occasion, as he was passing the rampart, he left directions that every foldier should be ready in his place, in order that, if the hill which they were going to examine, should be approved of, the whole might strike their tents, and follow them thither. In front of the camp was a fmall plain, and the road, leading thence to the hill, was open on all fides, and exposed to view. A watchman whom the Numidians had posted, not in expectation of an opportunity fo important as this, but with the hope of cutting off any party that might straggle too far in fearch of wood or forage, gave them the fignal to rife at once from their concealments. Those who were to come forth from the fummit and meet the enemy in front did not shew themselves, until the others, who were to enclose them on the rear, had got round. all fprung forward from every fide, and, raifing a shout, made a furious onset. Though the consuls were fo fituated in the valley that they could neither force their way up the hill, which was occupied by the enemy, nor, furrounded as they were, effect a retreat, the dispute might nevertheless have been protracted for a longer time, had not the Etrurians begun to fly, and thereby filled the rest with dismay. However, the Fregellans, though abandoned by the Etrurians, did not give up the contest, as long as the confuls remained unhurt; who, by their exhortations, and their own personal exertions, supported the spirit of the fight: but, afterwards, seeing both the confuls wounded, and Marcellus pierced through with a lance, and falling lifeless from his horse, then

BOOK then the few betook themselves to flight, carrying XXVII. with them Crispinus, who had received two wounds from javelins, and young Marcellus, who was also B.C. 208. hurt. Gne of the military tribunes, Aulus Manlius, was flain: of the two præfects of the allies, Marcus Aulius was killed, and Lucius Arennius taken: of the lictors of the confuls, five fell alive into the enemy's hands; of the rest, some were slain, the others fled with the conful. Forty-three horsemen fell in the fight and purfuit, and eighteen were made prisoners. The troops in camp had taken the alarm, and were going to fuccour the confuls, when they faw one conful, and the other conful's fon, both wounded, and the small remains of the unfortunate party on their return. The death of Marcellus, unhappy in other respects, was no less fo in this, that by a conduct, ill-becoming either his age (for he was now above fixty years old), or the prudence of a veteran commander, he had fo improvidently precipitated himself, his colleague, and, in some measure, the whole commonwealth into fuch desperate hazard. I should engage in too many and too long discussions on a single event, if I were to recite all the various relations given by different writers of the death of Marcellus. To omit other authors, Lucius Cælius presents us with three different narratives of that occurrence: one received by tradition; another written, and contained in the funeral panegyric, delivered by his fon, who was prefent in the action; and a third, which he produces as the real state of the fact, difcovered by his own inquiries. But how much foever reports vary, most of them, notwithstanding, concur in stating, that he went out of his camp to view the ground, and all, that he was slain in an ambuscade.

> XXVIII. Hannibal, supposing that the enemy must be greatly dismayed by the death of one of their their confuls, and the wounds of the other, and BOOK wishing not to lose any advantage which a juncture XXVII. fo favourable might afford, removed his camp im- Y.R.544. mediately to the hill on which the battle had been B.C. 208. fought. Here he found the body of Marcellus, and interred it. Crispinus, disheartened by his colleague's death and his own wounds, decamped in the filence of the following night, and, on the nearest mountains that he could reach, pitched his camp in an elevated fpot, fecure on all fides. On this occasion, the two commanders displayed great fagacity in their proceedings, while one endeavoured to effect, the other to guard against deception. Hannibal had, with Marcellus's body, gotten possession of his ring, and Crispinus, fearing lest mistakes occasioned by means of this fignet might give room to the Carthaginian for practifing some of his wiles, sent expresses round to all the neighbouring states to inform them, that 66 his colleague had been flain, that the enemy was "in possession of his ring, and that they should, 46 therefore, give no credit to any letters written in "the name of Marcellus." This message from the conful had but just arrived at Salapia, when a letter was brought thither from Hannibal, written in the name of Marcellus, intimating, that "he would come " to Salapia on the night which was to follow that "day; and directing that the foldiers of the garrifon " should be ready in case he should have occasion " to employ them." The Salapians were aware of the fraud; and judging that Hannibal, whom they had incenfed, not only by their defection from his party, but by killing his horsemen, was seeking an opportunity for revenge, fent back his melfen er, who was a Roman deferter, in order that the foldiers might act, as should be thought proper, without being watched by him; they then placed parties of the townsmen on guard along the walls, and in the convenient parts of the city, forming the guards and watches for that night with more than

BOOK ordinary care. On each fide of the gate, through

XXVII. which they expected the enemy to come, they placed the main strength of the garrison. About the fourth watch Hannibal approached the city: his van-guard was composed of Roman deserters, armed also in the Roman fashion. These, when they came to the gate, as they all spoke the Latine language, called up the watchmen, and ordered them to open the gate, for the conful was at hand. The watchmen, as if awaked by their call, were all in a hurry and bustle, striving to open the gate, which had been flut by letting down the portcullice: some raised this with levers, others pulled it up with ropes to fuch an height, that men might come in without stooping. Scarcely was the passage sufficiently opened, when the deferters rushed in eagerly through the gate; and, when about fix hundred had entered, the rope, by which it was kept fuspended, being loosened, the portcullice fell down with a great noise. of the Salapians now attacked the deferters, who, as if among friends, carried their arms carelessly on their shoulders, as on a march; while the rest, from the tower adjoining the gate and from the walls, beat off the enemy with stones, and pikes, and javelins. Thus Hannibal, enfnared by an artifice worthy of himfelf, was obliged to retire, and went thence to raife the fiege of Locri, which Cincius was pushing forward with the utmost vigour, having constructed various works, and being supplied with engines of every kind from Sicily. Mago, who almost despaired of being able to hold out and maintain the defence of the city. received the first gleam of returning hope from the news of Marcellus's death. This was foon followed by an express, acquainting him that Hannibal, having fent forward the Numidian cavalry, was hastening after, at the head of the main body of infantry, with all the speed he could make. As soon, therefore, as he understood, by signals made from the watchtowers, that the Numidians were drawing nigh, he, with with his own forces, fuddenly throwing open a gate, BOOK rushed out furiously on the besiegers. The fud. XXVII. denness of his attack, rather than inequality of Y.R.544. strength, at first made the dispute doubtful; but B.C. 208. afterwards, when the Numidians came up, the Romans were struck with such dismay, that they sled in confusion towards the sea and their ships, leaving behind their works and machines which they used in battering the walls. In this manner did the approach of Hannibal raise the siege of Locri.

XXIX. When Crifpinus learned that Hannibal had gone into Bruttium, he ordered Marcus Marcellus, military tribune, to lead away to Venusia the army which had been under the command of his colleague; and he himself, with his own legions, fet out for Capua, being scarcely able to endure the motion of a litter, his wounds were so very painful. But he first dispatched a letter to Rome, with an account of Marcellus's death, and of his own dangerous fituation. "It was not in his power," he faid, " to go to Rome to attend the elections, because he " was fure he should not be able to bear the fatigue " of the journey; and besides, that he was uneasy " about Tarentum, lest Hannibal might march "thither from Bruttium. It was therefore necel-" fary that some persons should be commissioned to " come to him in his quarters, men of prudence, to " whom he could with freedom speak his thoughts " on the present state of affairs." The reading of this letter caused great forrow for the death of one conful, and apprelientions for the fafety of the other. The fenate, therefore, fent Quintus Fabius the younger to Venusia, to take the command of the army there; and deputed three persons to wait on the conful, Sextus Julius Cæfar, Lucius Licinius Pollio, and Lucius Cincius Alimentus, who had a few days before come home from Sicily. These

BOOK were ordered to deliver a message to the consul, XXVII. that if he could not come himself to Rome, to hold the elections, he would, within the Roman territo-Y.R. 544. ries, nominate a dictator for that purpose; and directions were given, that in case the conful should have gone to Tarentum, then Quintus Cladius, the prætor, should lead the army from its present quarters into that part of the country where he could afford protection to the greatest number of the cities of the allies. In the course of this summer Marcus Valerius passed from Sicily to Africa with a fleet of one hundred fail, and making a descent near the city of Clupea, ravaged the country to a great extent, meeting scarcely any one in arms. After which, the troops employed in these depredations made a hasty retreat to their ships, in consequence of a fudden report that the Carthaginian fleet was approaching. This fleet confifted of eighty-three ships, with which the Roman commander came to an engagement not far from Clupea, and gained a complete victory. After taking eighteen ships, and dispersing the rest, he returned to Lilybæum with abundance of booty acquired both on land and fea.

> XXX. Philip, during this furnmer, brought affiftance to the Achæans, in compliance with their earnest entreaties; for, on one fide, Machanidas, tyrant of the Lacedæmonians, haraffed them continually by irruptions from his territories, which lay contiguous to theirs; and on another, the Ætolians, transporting an army, in ships, through the streight which runs between Naupactus and Patræ, called by the neighbouring inhabitants Rhios, had spread devastations through the country. A report also prevailed, that Attalus, King of Afia, intended to come over into Europe, because the Ætolians, in their last general council, had constituted him chief magistrate of their state. While Philip was, for all these reafons, fons, marching down into Greece, he was met at BOOK the city of Lamia by the Ætolians, under the com- XXVII. mand of Pyrrhias, who had been created prætor for Y.R.544. that year, conjointly with Attalus, on account of the B.C. 208. latter's absence. Besides their own forces, they had a body of auxiliaries fent by Attalus, and about one thousand men from the Roman fleet of Publius Sulpicius. Against this commander, and these forces, Philip fought twice with fuccess; and, in each battle, slew at least one thousand. The Ætolians being fo greatly difmayed, as to keep themselves close under the walls of Lamia, Philip led back his army to Phalara. This place, being fituated on the Malian bay, was formerly thickly inhabited, on account of its excellent harbour, the fafe anchorage on either fide, with other commodious circumstances, to which both the fea and the land contributed. Hither came ambaffadors from Ptolemy King of Egypt, the Rhodians, Athenians, and Chians, with intent to compose the differences between Philip and the Ætolians. The Ætolians also invited a mediator from among their neighbours, Amynander, King of Athamania. But the concern of all was engaged, not fo much by their regard for the Ætolians, who were remarkable for an arrogance unbecoming a Grecian state, as by their wishes to prevent Philip from interfering in any of the affairs of Greece; an interference which would be highly dangerous to the general liberty. The deliberations concerning a pacification were adjourned to the meeting of the council of the Achæans, and a certain time and place were fixed for that affembly. In the meantime, a truce for thirty days was obtained. The King, proceeding thence through Theffaly and Bœotia, came to Chalcis in Euboea, with design to exclude Attalus from the harbours and coasts, for intelligence had been received that he intended to come to Eubæa with a fleet. Afterwards, leaving there a BOOK body of troops, to oppose Attalus, in case he should happen to arrive in the mean-time; and fetting out himself with a few horsemen and light infantry, he B.C. 208. came to Argos. Here the superintendance of the games of Hærean Juno and Nemæan Hercules being conferred on him by the suffrages of the people, because the Kings of the Macedonians affect to derive the origin of their family from that city, he performed those in honour of Juno; and, as foon as they were finished, went off instantly to Ægium, to the council summoned some time before. affembly feveral schemes were proposed for putting an end to the Ætolian war, that neither the Romans nor Attalus might have any pretence for entering Greece. But every measure of the kind was defeated at once by the Ætolians, when the time of the truce had fcarcely expired, on their hearing that Attalus was arrived at Ægina, and that the Roman fleet lay at Naupactus. For being called into the council of the Achæans, where were likewise present the same ambassadors who had treated of a pacification at Phalara, they at first complained of some trifling acts committed during the truce, contrary to the faith of the convention, at last declaring that the war could not be terminated on any other terms than by the Achæans giving back Pylus to the Messenians, Atintania to the Romans, and Ardyza to Scerdilzdus and Pleuratus. Philip, conceiving the utmost indignation at the vanquished party presuming to prescribe terms to their conqueror, said, that "in listening " before to proposals of peace, or in agreeing to a " truce, he had not been led by any expectation " that the Ætolians would remain quiet, but by 46 his wish to have all the confederates witnesses that "the object of his pursuits was peace; of theirs, "war." Thus, without any thing being effected towards an accommodation, he dismissed the assembly, left five thousand foldiers to protect the Acheans, receiving receiving from them five ships of war, with which, BOOK added to a fleet lately fent to him from Carthage, XXVII. and some vessels then on their way from Bithynia, Y.R. 544. fent by King Prusias, he had resolved, if he could B.C. 208. effect the junction, to try his strength in a naval engagement with the Romans, who had long been masters of the sea in that part of the world. After diffolving the council, he went back to Argos, because the time of the Nemæan games was approaching, and he wished to give them, by his presence, an additional degree of splendor.

Y.R.544.

XXXI. While the King was employed in the celebration of the games, and, during that feafon of festivity, indulging his mind in relaxation from military operations, Publius Sulpicius fetting fail from Naupactus, arrived on the coast between Sicyon and Corinth, making violent depredations on that fine and fertile country. The news of this event called away Philip from the exhibition. He marched off with rapidity at the head of his cavalry, leaving orders for the infantry to follow; and, while the Romans were straggling at random, and heavily laden with booty, not apprehending any danger of the kind, he attacked and drove them to their ships. Thus the Roman fleet returned to Naupactus with little cause of triumph for the booty which they had On the other fide, Philip, by the fame of a victory, whatever might be its real importance, gained however over Romans, added greatly to the lustre of the remaining part of the games; and the festival was celebrated with extraordinary rejoicings, to which he contributed also by his popular behaviour: for, laying aside his diadem, purple robe, and other royal apparel, he fet himfelf, with respect to appearance, on a level with the rest; than which nothing can be more grateful to the people of free states. This conduct would have afforded very strong hopes of general liberty, had he not. debased

BOOK debased and dishonoured all by intolerable de-XXVI. bauchery: for, night and day, with one or two attendants, he ranged through the houses of married B.C. 208. people. He had lowered his dignity to the common level, confequently the less conspicuous he appeared, the less restraint he was under; and thus the liberty of which he had given others an empty prospect, he stretched to the utmost in the gratification of his own libidinous defires. Money and feductive discourses were not always sufficient for his purpofes; he even employed violence in aid of them, and dangerous was it for husbands and parents to shew inflexible strictness in obstructing the lustful passions of the King. He took from Aratus (a man of distinction among the Achæans) his wife, named Polycratia, and deluding her with the hope of being married to a fovereign prince, carried her into Macedonia. After spending the time of the celebration of the games, and feveral days after they were finished, in this scandalous manner, he marched to Dymæ, with defign to dislodge a garrison of the Ætolians, who had been invited by the Eleans, and received into that city. At Dymæ he was joined by the Achæans, under Cycliades their chief magistrate, who were inflamed with hatred against the Eleans, because they refused to unite with the other states of Achaia, and highly incenfed against the Ætolians, whom they believed to be the authors of the war carried on against them by the Romans. Leaving Dymæ, and uniting their forces, they passed the river Larissus, which separates the territory of Elis from that of Dymæ.

> XXXII. The first day on which they entered the enemy,'s borders, they fpent in plundering. On the next, they advanced to the city in order of battle, having fent forward the cavalry, to ride up to the gates, and provoke the Ætolians, who were ever well inclined to embrace an opportunity of fallying out from their works. They did not know that BOOK Sulpicius, with fifteen ships, had come over from XXVII. Naupactus to Cyllene, and landing four thousand Y.R.544. foldiers, had, in the dead of night, left his march B.C. 208. should be observed, thrown himself into Elis. When therefore they perceived, among the Ætolians and Eleans, the Roman standards and arms, an appearance fo unexpected filled them with the greatest terror. At first, the King had a mind to order a retreat, but the Ætolians being already engaged with the Trallians, a tribe of Illyrians fo called, and his party appearing to have the worst of the contest, he himself, at the head of his cavalry, made a charge on a Roman cohort. Here the horse of Philip, being pierced through with a spear, threw him forward, over his head, to the ground, which gave rife to a furious conflict between the contending parties; the Romans preffing hard on the King, and his own men protecting him. His own behaviour on the occasion was remarkably brave, although he was obliged to fight on foot, among squadrons of cavalry. In a short time, the dispute becoming unequal, great numbers being killed and wounded near him, he was forced away by his foldiers, and, mounting another horse, fled from the field. He pitched his camp that day at the distance of five miles from the city of Elis; and, on the next, led all his forces to a fort called Pyrgus, where, as he had heard, a multitude of the country people, with their cattle, had run together through fear of being plundered. This irregular and unarmed crowd were fo utterly difinayed at his approach, that he at once made himself master of the whole, and by this seizure gained compensation for whatever differace he had fustained at Elis. While he was distributing the fpoil and prisoners, the latter amounting to four thousand men, and the cattle of all kinds to twenty thousand, news arrived from Macedonia, that a per-

BOOK fon called Eropus, had, by bribing the commander XXVII. of the garrison and citadel, gained possession of Lychnidus; that he had also got into his hands Y.R.544. fome towns of the Dassartians, and was, besides, endeavouring to persuade the Dardanians to take arms. In confequence of this intelligence, dropping the profecution of the war between the Achæans and Ætolians, but leaving, however, two thousand five hundred foldiers, of one fort or other, under the command of Menippus and Polyphantas, to affift his allies, he marched away from Dymæ, through Achaia, Bœotia, and Eubœa, and on the tenth day arrived at Demetrias in Thessaly. Here he was met by other couriers, with accounts of still more dangerous commotions; that the Dardanians, pouring into Macedonia, had already feized on Orestis, and marched down into the plain of Argestæ, and that a report prevailed among the barbarians, that Philip had been flain. This rumour was occasioned by the following circumstance. his expedition against the plundering parties near Sicyon, being carried by the impetuofity of his horse against a tree, a projecting branch broke off one of the fide ornaments of his helmet, which being found by an Ætolian, and carried into Ætolia to Scerdilædus, who knew it to be the cognizance of the King, it was supposed that he was killed. After Philip's departure from Achæa, Sulpicius, failing to Ægina, ioined his fleet to that of Attalus. The Achæans gained the victory in a battle with the Ætolians and Éleans, fought near Messene. King Attalus and Publius Sulpicius wintered at Ægina.

> XXXIII. Towards the close of this year, the conful Titus Quintius Crispinus, after having nominated Titus Manlius Torquatus dictator, to prefide at the elections, and folemnize the games, died of his wounds, according to some writers, at Tarentum; 5

according to others, in Campania. Thus was there BOOK a concurrence of events, such as had never been XXVII. experienced in any former war, while the two con-Y.R.544. fuls being flain, without having fought any memora- B.C. 208. ble battle, left the commonwealth, as it were, fatherless. The dictator Manlius appointed Caius Servilius, then curule ædile, his master of the horse. fenate, on the first day of its meeting, ordered the dictator to celebrate the great games, which Marcus Æmilius, city prætor, had exhibited in the confulate of Caius Flaminius and Cneius Servilius, and had vowed to be repeated at the end of five years. Accordingly, he not only performed them now, but vowed them for the next lustrum. But as the two confular armies, without commanders, were fo near the enemy, both the fenate and people, laying afide all other concerns, made it their chief and only care to have confuls elected as foon as possible, and especially that they should be men whose courage was fo tempered by prudence as to guard them fufficiently against Carthaginian wiles: for it was confidered, that, as through the whole course of the present war, the too warm and precipitate tempers of their generals had been productive of great losses, so, in that very year, the consuls, through excessive eagerness to engage the enemy, had fallen unguardedly into their fnares; that the gods, however, compassionating the Roman nation, had spared the troops, who were guiltless of the fault, and had decreed that the penalty incurred by the rashness of the commanders should fall on their own heads. When the fenate looked round for proper persons to be appointed to the confulship, Caius Claudius Nero at once met their view as eminently qualified beyond all others. fought a colleague for him. They well knew him to be a man of extraordinary abilities, but, at the fame time, of a temper more fanguine and enterprifing than was expedient in the present exigencies of the BOOK war, or against such an opponent an Hannibal; and, XXVII. therefore, they thought it necessary to qualify his disposition by joining with him a man of moderation and prudence.

XXXIV. Many years before this, Marcus Livius, on the expiration of his confulship, had been judged guilty of misconduct by a sentence of the people; and he was so deeply affected by this disgrace, that he retired into the country, and, for a long time, avoided not only the city, but all intercourse with mankind. About eight years afterwards, Marcus Claudius Marcellus, and Marcus Valerius Lævinus, then confuls, brought him back into Rome; but still he appeared in a squalid dress, and suffered his hair and beard to grow, displaying in his countenance and garb a more than ordinary fenfibility of the centure passed on him. When Lucius Veturius and Publius Licinius were cenfors, they compelled him to be flaved, to lay afide his fordid apparel, to attend the meetings of the fenate, and perform other public duties. But, after all this, he used to give his vote either by a fingle word, or by going to the fide of the house which he approved, until a trial came on in the cause of Marcus Livius Macatus, a man to whom he was related, and whose character was at stake; and this obliged him to deliver his fentiments at large in the fenate. The speech which he made, after so long an interval of filence, drew on him all eyes, and became the fubject of much conversation: it was afferted, that "the people had treated him with great injustice, " and that the confequences of this undeferved ill-" treatment had been highly injurious to that very " people; as, during a war of fuch importance and " danger, the state had been deprived both of the " fervices and counsels of so great a man. With " Caius Nero, neither Quintus Fabius, nor Marcus " Valerius

" Valerius Lævinus could be joined in office; be- BOOK " cause the law did not allow the election of two XXVII. patricians. The same objection lay against Titus Y.R.544. "Manlius, besides that he had before resused the B.C. 208. 66 offer of the confulship, and would again refuse it. "But if the election of Marcus Livius, in conjunc-"tion with Caius Nero, could be effected, then "they would have fuch confuls as could fcarcely be " equalled." Nor were the commons difinclined to the proposal, although it took its rife from the patricians. One only person in the state, the person to whom the honour was offered, objected to the measure; charging the people with levity and inconstancy, he said, that "when he appeared before "them in the fituation of a defendant, in a mourn-" ing habit, they refused him their compassion; yet " now they forced upon him the white gown against 66 his will, heaping punishments and honours on the " same object. If they deemed him an honest man, 66 why had they condemned him as wicked and "guilty? If they had discovered proofs of his " guilt, after feeing fuch reason to repent of having " trusted him with the consulship once, why entrust " him with it a fecond time?" While he uttered thefe, and fuch like reproaches and complaints, he was checked by the fenators, who bade him recollect, that " Camillus, though exiled by his country, " yet returned at its call, and re-established it, when " shaken from the very foundations; that it was the "duty of a man to mollify by patience, and to bear " with refignation, the feverity of his country, like "that of a parent." By the united exertions of all, Marcus Livius was elected conful with Caius Claudius Nero.

XXXV. Three days after, the election of prætors was held, and there were chosen into that office, Lucius Porcius Licinus, Caius Mamilius Aulus, and Caius Hostilius Cato. As soon as the elections were

BOOK concluded, and the games celebrated, the dictator XXVII. and master of the horse resigned their offices. Caius Y.R.544. Terentius Varro was sent, as proprætor, into Etru-B.C.208. ria, in order that Caius Hostilius might go from that province to Tarentum, to take the command of the army which had acted under the late conful, Titus Quintius; and that Titus Manlius might go beyond sea, in the character of ambassador, to obferve what bufiness was going on abroad; and also, as, during that fummer, the Olympic games were to be exhibited, which were always attended by the greatest concourse of the people of Greece, that he might go to that affembly, if not prevented by the enemy, and inform any Sicilians whom he should find driven there, and any citizens of Tarentum, banished by Hannibal, that they might return to their homes, and might be affured that the Roman people meant to restore to them the whole of the property which they possessed before the war began. As the approaching year feemed to threaten the greatest dangers, and there were, as yet, no magistrates for the administration of public affairs, all men directed their attention to the confuls elect. and wished them, as speedily as possible, to cast lots for their provinces, that each of them might know beforehand what province and what antagonist he was to have. Measures were also taken in the senate, on a motion made by Quintus Fabius Maximus, to reconcile them to each other; for there subsisted between them an avowed enmity, which, on the fide of Livius, was the more inveterate, as, during his misfortunes, he had felt himself treated with contempt by the other. He was therefore the more obstinately implacable, and infifted, that "there was no need of any reconci-" liation: for they would conduct all business with "the greater diligence and activity, while each " should be afraid, lest a colleague, who was his " enemy, might find means of exalting his own " character character at the other's expence." Nevertheless BOOK the influence of the fenate prevailed on them to lay XXVII. afide their animofity, and to act with harmony and Y.R.544. unanimity in the administration of the government. B.C. 208. The provinces allotted to them were not, as in former years, a joint command in the same districts, but quite separate, in the remotest extremities of Italy: to one, Bruttium and Lucania, where he was to act against Hannibal; to the other, Gaul, where he was to oppose Hasdrubal, who was now faid to be approaching to the Alps. It was ordered that the conful to whose lot Gaul fell, should, of the two armies, (one of which was in Gaul, and the other in Etruria,) choose whichever he thought proper, and join to it the city legions; and that he to whom the province of Bruttium fell, should, after enlisting new legions for the city, take his choice of the armies commanded by the confuls of the preceding year; and that the army left by the conful should be given to Quintus Fulvius, proconful, and that he should continue in command for the year. To Caius Hostilius, to whom they had assigned the province of Tarentum, in exchange for Etruria, they now gave Capua instead. One legion was ordered for him, - that which Fulvius had commanded the year before.

XXXVI. The public anxiety respecting Hasdrubal's march into Italy increased daily. At first. envoys from the Massilians brought information, that he had passed into Gaul, and that the inhabitants of that country were in high spirits on the occasion; because it was reported, that he had brought a vast quantity of gold for the purpose of hiring auxiliaries. In company with these envoys, on their return, were fent from Rome, Sextus Antistius and Marcus Retius, to inquire into the matter; who brought back an account, that they had fent persons with Massilian guides, who, by means of some Gallic chief-

BOOK chieftains, connected in friendship with the Massi-XXVII. lians, might procure exact intelligence of every particular; and that they had discovered, with certainty, Y.R 544. the Hasdrubal, having already collected a very numerous army, intended to pass the Alps in the following fpring, and that nothing prevented his doing it immediately, but the passes of those mountains being shut up by the winter. Publius Ælius Pætus was elected and inaugurated into the office of augur, in the room of Marcus Marcellus; and Cneius Cornelius Dolabella into that of king in religious matters, in the room of Marcus Marcius, who had died two years before. In this year, the first time since Hannibal's coming into Italy, the lustrum was closed by the cenfors, Publius Sempronius Tuditanus and Marcus Cornelius Cethegus. The number of citizens rated was one hundred and thirty-seven thoufand one hundred and eight, a number much smaller than it had been before the war. It is recorded that, in this fame year, the Comitium was covered, and the Roman games once repeated by the curule ædiles, Quintus Metellus and Caius Servilius; and the plebeian games twice, by the plebeian ædiles, Quintus Mamilius and Marcus Cæcilius Metellus. These also erected three statues in the temple of Ceres, and there was a feast of Jupiter on occasion Y.R.545. of the games. Then entered on the confulship Caius BC 207. Claudius Nero and Marcus Livius, a fecond time; and as they had already, when confuls elect, cast lots for their provinces, they now ordered the prætors to do the same. To Caius Hostilius fell the city jurisdiction, to which the foreign was added, in order that three prætors might go abroad to the provinces. To Aulus Hostilius fell Sardinia; to Caius Mamilius, Sicily; and to Lucius Porcius, Gaul. The whole of the legions, amounting to twenty-three, were distributed in such manner, that each of the confuls should have two, Spain four, the three prætors, in Sicily, Sardinia, and Gaul, two each:

each; Caius Terentius, in Etruria, two; Quintus BOOK Fulvius, in Bruttium, two; Quintus Claudius, about XXVII. Tarentum and Sallentum, two; Caius Hostilius Tu-Y.R.545. bulus, at Capua, one; and two were ordered to be B.C.207. raised for the city. For the first four legions, the people elected tribunes; for the rest, they were appointed by the confuls.

XXXVII. Before the confuls left home, the nine days folemnity was performed, on account of a shower of stones having fallen from the sky at Veii. The mention of one prodigy was, as usual, followed by reports of others: that the temple of Jupiter at Minturnæ, a grove at Marica, a wall and a gate of Atella, had been ftruck by lightning. The people of Minturnæ added, what was still more terrifying, that a stream of blood had flowed in at one of their gates: at Capua, too, a wolf came into one of the gates, and tore the centinel. These prodigies were expiated with victims of the greater kinds; and a fupplication, of one day's continuance, was ordered by the pontiffs. The nine days folemnity was afterwards performed a fecond time, on account of a shower of stones seen to fall during the armilustrum. The people's minds were no fooner freed from religious apprehensions, than they were again disturbed by an account, that, at Frusino, an infant was born of a fize equal to that of a child four years old, and wonderful, not only for its bulk, but for its fex being doubtful; as had been the case of the one born, two years before, at Sinuessa. Aruspices, fent for from Etruria, denounced this to be a portent particularly horrid, that ought to be exterminated from the Roman territories, and without being fufferent to touch the earth, drowned in the fea. Accordingly, they shut it up alive in a chest, and threw it into the deep. The pontiffs likewife issued a mandate, that thrice nine virgins should go in procession through the city, singing a hymn. While LL 2 they '

BOOK they were employed, in the temple of Jupiter Stator, XXVII. learning this hymn, which was composed by the Y.R. 545. poet Livius, the temple of Imperial Juno, on the B.C. 207. Aventine, was struck by lightning. The aruspices. having delivered their judgment that this prodigy had respect to the matrons, and that the goddess ought to be appealed by an offering, the curule ædiles, by an edict, fummoned together, into the Capitol all those matrons who had houses in the city of Rome, or within ten miles of it; and from this number they chose twenty-five, to whom they paid in a contribution out of their own effects. money a golden bason was made, and carried to the Aventine, where the matrons, with every demonstration of purity and fanctity, immolated to the goddess. Immediately after, the decemvirs, by proclamation, appointed a day for another facrifice to the fame divinity, which was conducted in the following order: - From the temple of Apollo, two white heifers were led into the city, through the Carmental gate; after them were carried two cypress images of Imperial Juno; then followed the twenty-feven virgins, clad in long robes, finging the hymn in honour of that deity. This hymn might perhaps, to the uninformed judgments of those times, appear to have merit, but, if repeated at present, it would seem barbarous and uncouth. The train of virgins was followed by the decemvirs, crowned with laurel, and dressed in purple-bordered robes. From the gate they proceeded through the Jugarian street into the Forum: here the procession halted, and a cord was given to the virgins, of which they all took hold, and then advanced, beating time with their feet to the music of their voices. Thus they proceeded through the Tuscan street, the Velabrum, the cattle-market, and up the Publician hill, until they arrived at the temple of Imperial Juno. There, two victims were offered in facrifice by the decemvirs, and the cypress images were placed in the temple. XXXVIII.

XXXVIII. After due expiations were offered BOOK to the gods, the confuls began to enlift foldiers; XXVII. and this business they enforced with more strict- Y.R. 545. ness and severity than had been formerly practifed B.C. 207. within the memory of any then living; for the new enemy, advancing towards Italy, made the war doubly formidable. As the number of young men capable of ferving, was confiderably diminished, they refolved to compel even the maritime colonies to furnish soldiers, although they were said to enjoy, under a folemn grant, an immunity from fervice. At first, they refused compliance; on which the confuls published orders, that each state should, on a certain day, produce before fenate the title on which it claimed fuch exemp-On the day appointed, the following states appeared before the fenate; Oftia, Alfia, Antium, Anxur, Minturnæ, Sinuessa; and, from the coast of the upper sea, Sena. These recited their several claims; but none of them were allowed, except those of Antium and Ostia; and even in these two colonies the young men were obliged to fwear, that, while the enemy remained in Italy, they would not lodge out of the walls of their colonies longer than thirty days. Although it was the opinion of all, that the confuls ought to open the campaign as early as possible, as it would be necessary to oppose Hasdrubal immediately on his descent from the Alps, lest he might seduce the Cifalpine Gauls and Etruria, which latter already entertained fanguine hopes of effecting a revolt; alfo, that it would be necessary to give Hannibal full employ in his own quarters, lest he might extricate himself from Bruttium, and advance to meet his brother: yet Livius delayed, not being fatisfied with the forces destined for his provinces, while his colleague had a choice of two excellent confular armies, and a third which Quintus Claudius

BOOK commanded at Tarentum; he therefore introduced XXVII. a proposal of recalling the volunteer flaves to the standards. The senate gave the consuls unlimited B.C. 207. power to fill up their companies with any men whom they approved; to choose out of all the armies such as they liked, and to exchange them; and remove them from one province to another, as they should judge best for the public service. In the management of all these matters, the greatest harmony prevailed between the confuls; and the volunteer flaves were enrolled in the nineteenth and twentieth Some writers fay, that on this occasion powerful reinforcements were also sent from Spain by Publius Scipio to Marcus Livius; eight thousand Spaniards and Gauls, two thousand legionary soldiers, and a body of cavalry composed of Numidians and Spaniards, in number one thousand eight hundred; that Marcus Lucretius brought these forces by fea, and that Caius Mamilius fent from Sicily four thousand archers and slingers.

> XXXIX. The disquietude at Rome was increased by a letter brought out of Gaul from the prætor Lucius Porcius; the contents of which were, that " Hasdrubal had moved out of winter-quarters, and "was now on his passage over the Alps; that " eight thousand of the Ligurians were embodied " and armed, and would join him as foon as he " arrived in Italy, unless an army were fent into " Liguria to attack them beforehand: as to himself, " he would advance as far as he should think it safe " with his fmall force." This letter obliged the confuls to finish the levies with haste, and to set out for their respective provinces earlier than they had intended; for their purpose was, that each should keep his antagonist employed in his own province, fo as not to fuffer the two to combine their forces into one body. An opinion, formed by Hannibal, helped helped to further their defign: for though he be-BOOK lieved that his brother would make good his way XXVII. into Italy during the course of that summer, yet, Y.R.545 when he reflected on the difficulties with which he B.C. 207. had himself struggled, first in the passage of the Rhone, then in that of the Alps, fighting against men, and against the nature of the places, for five fuccessive months, he had not the least expectation that the other would be able to effect his purpose with fo much more eafe and expedition; and, for this reason, he was the later in quitting his winterquarters. But Hasdrubal found every thing to proceed more easily and expeditiously than either himfelf or others had even ventured to hope: for the Arvernians, and afterwards the other Gallic and Alpine tribes, not only gave him a friendly reception, but even accompanied him to the war.. Then, in most parts of the country through which he marched, roads had been made by his brother in places until then impassable; besides which, as the Alps had, for twelve years, been a constant route for divers people, he found the disposition of the inhabitants much improved. For in former times, being never visited by foreigners, or accustomed to fee a stranger in their country, they were unsociable towards all the human race. Being ignorant at first of the destination of the Carthaginian, they had imagined that his object was their rocks and forts, and to make prey of their men and cattle: but the accounts which they heard of the Punic war, and by which Italy had fo long been haraffed, by this time fully convinced them, that the Alps were only used as a passage, and that two overgrown states, feparated by vast tracts of sea and land, were contending for power and empire. These causes opened the Alps to Haldrubal. But whatever advantage he gained from the celerity of his march, he lost it all by delaying at Placentia, where he carried on a fruitless blockade, rather than an attack. He had supposed.

BOOK supposed that the reduction of a town, standing in a XXVII. plain, would be easily accomplished; and being a colony of great note, he was persuaded that, by destroying this city, he should fill the rest with terror. That siege, however, not only impeded his own progress, but also stopped Hannibal when he was just setting out from his winter-quarters, in consequence of hearing that his brother had reached Italy so much more quickly than he had expected. For he considered not only how tedious the siege of a city is, but also how inessectually he himself, going back victorious from the Trebia, had attempted that same colony.

XL. The confuls, taking different routes, when fetting out to open the campaign, drew the anxiety of the public in opposite directions, as if to two distinct wars at once: for, besides their recollection of the heavy calamities which Hannibal's first coming had brought upon Italy, people were farther distressed by doubts of the issue. "What gods," faid they to themselves, "would be so propitious to " the city, and to the empire, as to grant fuccess " to their arms in both quarters at the same time? "Hitherto, the business had been protracted by a " counterpoise of successes and misfortunes. " in Italy, at the Trasimenus and Cannæ, the Roman power had been crushed to the earth, " a number of fuccessful efforts in Spain had raised " it up from its fallen state: when afterwards, in "Spain, a fuccession of defeats, in which two ex-" cellent commanders were loft, had, in a great " measure, ruined the two armies, the many advan-" tages gained by the Roman arms in Italy and " Sicily, had afforded shelter to the shattered vessel of the state. Besides, even the distance of " place, one war being then carried on in the re-" motest extremity of the world, allowed room to " breathe: but now, two wars had penetrated into the very heart of Italy; two commanders, of the BOOK " most distinguished reputation, stood on the oppo- XXVII. " fite fides of the city of Rome; and the whole Y.R.545. " mass of danger, the entire burthen, pressed upon B.C. 207. " one spot. Whichever of these commanders should " first gain a battle, he would, in a few days after, " join his camp with the other." The preceding year, alfo, having been faddened by the deaths of the two confuls, ferved to augment the general apprehenfions.' Such were the melancholy forebodings which perplexed the minds of the people, as they escorted the commanders on their departure to their provinces. Historians have mentioned, that Marcus Livius, when fetting out for the campaign, being still full of refentment against his countrymen, and warned by Quintus Fabius " not to come to a battle hastily, " or before he was well acquainted with the kind of " enemy whom he had to encounter;" answered that " the first moment that he should get a fight of "that enemy, he would fight him;" being asked the reason of such eagerness, he replied, "I will ac-" quire either extraordinary glory from the defeat of "the foe, or joy from that of my countrymen; and " though the latter might not perhaps redound to my " honour, yet it is certainly what they have deserved " at my hands." Before the conful Claudius arrived in his province, as Hannibal was leading his army towards Sallentum, through the very borders of the Larinatian frontiers, Caius Hostilius Tubulus, with fome lightly accoutred cohorts, attacked him, and caused dreadful confusion among his unmarshalled troops, killing four thousand men, and taking nine military standards. Quintus Claudius, who had his forces cantoned through the towns in the territory of Sallentum, on being apprifed of the enemy's motions, marched out of his winter-quarters: wherefore, Hannibal, lest he should be obliged to encounter the two armies at once, decamped in the night, and withdrew from the Tarentine territory into Bruttium-Claudius

BOOK Claudius fell back to the country adjoining Sal-XXVII. lentum. Hostilius, on his march towards Capua, met the conful Claudius at Venusia; and here Y.R.545. Mer the condit Claudius at Ventura, and here B.C. 207. were felected, out of both armies, forty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse, with which the conful was to act against Hannibal. The rest of the forces, Hostilius was ordered to lead to Capua, that he might deliver them up to Quintus Fulvius, proconful.

> XLI. Hannibal, having drawn together his forces from all quarters, both those which he had hitherto kept in winter-quarters, and those which were in garrison in the Bruttian territory, came into Lucania, to Grumentum, in hope of regaining the towns, which, through fear, had joined the Romans. To the fame place came the Roman conful, from Venusia, carefully examining the roads as he went, and pitched his camp at the distance of about fifteen hundred paces from the enemy. From hence the rampart of the Carthaginians feemed to be almost close to the wall of Grumentum; the actual distance, however, was five hundred paces. Between the Carthaginian and Roman camps the ground was level; and on the left-hand fide of the Carthaginians, and right of the Romans, stood some naked hills, from which neither party apprehended any mischief, because there were no woods, nor any covering for an ambuscade. Parties, sallying from the advanced posts, fought several skirmishes of little consequence. It appeared plainly that the Roman general had no other object in view than to hinder the enemy from quitting the place; while Hannibal, wishing to get away, frequently drew out his whole strength, and offered battle. On this occasion, the conful adopted the crafty genius of his adverfary; and, as there could be little apprehension of a furprize, the hills being open, and having been examined by his fcouts, he ordered five cohorts, with five five additional companies, to pass over their summit BOOK in the night, and conceal themselves in the vallies XXVII. on the other fide. The time when they were to rife Y.R.545. from their ambush he settled with Tiberius Claudius B.C.207. Afellus, military tribune, and Publius Claudius, præfect of the allies, whom he fent at their head. He himself, at the dawn of day, drew out all his forces, both foot and horse, into the field. In a short time after, Hannibal also, on his side, displayed the signal for battle, and a great noise ensued in his camp, while the men ran hastily to arms. Then all, both horse and foot, rushed eagerly out of the gates, and scattering themselves over the plain, advanced hastily to attack the enemy. The conful, obferving them in this diforder, commanded Caius Au-- runculeius, tribune of the third legion, to make his cavalry charge them with all possible fury, remarking, that "they had fpread themselves like cattle "over the plain, and in fuch confusion that, be-" fore they could be formed, they might be rode " down, and trodden under foot."

XLII. Hannibal had not yet come out of his camp, when he heard the shouts of the troops engaged: alarmed at this, he led his forces with all speed towards the enemy. The charge of the Roman cavalry had already distressed his van, and, of their infantry, the first legion and the right wing were coming into action, while the Carthaginians, without any regular order, began the fight just as chance threw each in the way of either horseman or footinan. The combatants, on both fides, were fultained by reinforcements; and Hannibal, in the midft of the terror and tumult, would have formed his line while fighting, which is no easy matter, unless to a veteran commander, and in the case of veteran troops, but that the shout of the cohorts and companies, running down from the hills, and which was heard on their rear, struck them with the fear of being. B.C. 207.

BOOK cut off from their camp: and had it not been near, XXVII. (seized as they were with a panic, and flying in every part,) very great numbers would have been flain: for the cavalry stuck close to their rear, and the cohorts, running down the declivity of the hills, over clear and level ground, affailed them in flank. However, upwards of eight thousand men were killed, more than feven hundred men made prisoners, and nine military standards were taken. Even of the elephants, which in fuch a fudden and irregular action had been of no use, four were killed, and two taken. Of the Romans, and their allies, there fell about five hundred. Next day the Carthaginian kept himself quiet. The Roman brought his army into the field, and when he faw that none came out to meet him, he ordered the spoils of the flain to be collected, and the bodies of his own men to be brought together, and buried. After this, for feveral fuccessive days, he pushed up so close to the enemy's gates, that he feemed to intend an affault; but, at length, Hannibal decamped, at the third watch of the night, and made towards Apulia, leaving a great number of fires and tents on the fide of the camp which faced the enemy, and a few Numidians, who were to fhew themselves on the ramparts and at the As foon as day appeared, the Roman army came up to the trenches, the Numidians, as directed, fhewing themselves for some time on the ramparts; having imposed on the enemy as long as possible, they rode off at full speed, until they overtook the body of their army. The conful, perceiving the camp perfectly filent, and no longer feeing any where even the small number who had paraded in view, at the dawn of day dispatched two horsemen to examine the state of the works; and when he learned, with certainty, that all was fafe, he ordered his army to march in. Here he delayed no longer than while his men collected the plunder; then, founding a retreat, long before night, he brought back his forces into into their tents. Next day, at the first light, he set BOOK out, and following by long marches the tracks of the XXVII. Carthaginians, by such intelligence as he could procure, Y.R.545. overtook them not far from Venusia. Here likewise B.C. 207. an irregular kind of battle was fought, in which above two thousand of the fugitives fell. From thence. Hannibal, marching in the night, and taking his way through mountains, that he might not be forced to an engagement, proceeded towards Metapontum: from which place Hanno, who commanded the garrison of the town, was fent, with a small party, into Bruttium, to raise fresh forces; while Hannibal, with the addition of the garrison to his own troops, went back to Venusia by the same roads through which he had come, and thence to Canufium. never quitted the enemy's steps, and when he was going himself to Metapontum, had sent orders to Quintus Fulvius to come into Lucania, lest that country should be left without defence.

XLIII. In the mean-time, Hafdrubal, having raifed the siege of Placentia, sent four Gallic horsemen, and two Numidians, with a letter for Hannibal; these, after traversing almost the whole length of Italy, through the midst of enemies, in order to follow him on his retreat to Metapontum, mistook the road, and went towards Tarentum, where they were seized by some Roman foragers, roving through the country, and conducted to the proprætor Quintus At first, they eluded his inquiries by evafive answers; but, on being threatened with torture, fear compelled them to own the truth, and they confessed that they were charged with a letter from Hasdrubal to Hannibal. With this letter, sealed as it was, the prisoners were given in charge to Lucius Virginius, military tribune, to be conducted to the conful Claudius, and two troops of Samnite horse were fent to efcort them. Claudius caused the letter Y.R 545 B.C. 207.

BOOK to be read to him by an interpreter, and having examined the prisoners, he concluded that the prefent conjuncture of affairs was not of such a nature as to require that the confuls should carry on the war according to regular plans, each within the limits of his own province, by means of his own troops, and against an antagonist pointed out by the senate; but that fome extraordinary and daring stroke should be struck, such as could not be foreseen or thought of, which, at its commencement, might cause no less dread among their countrymen than among the enemy; but, when accomplished, would convert their great fears into as great exultation. Wherefore, fending Hasdrubal's letter to Rome, to the senate, he at the fame time acquainted the Conscript Fathers with his intentions, advising that, as Hasdrubal had written to his brother that he would meet him in Umbria, they should immediately call home the legion then at Capua, raise new levies, and post the city army at Narnia, to intercept the enemy. Such were the contents of his letter to the fenate: for himself, he fent on messengers, through the districts of Larina, Marrucia, Frentana, and Prætutia, along the road which he intended to take with his army; giving directions, that all the inhabitants should bring down from their towns and farms, victuals ready-dreffed for the foldiers, and that they should furnish horses and other beafts of burthen, to that the weary might be accommodated with easy transports. then felected from the Romans and allies the flower of their armies, confifting of fix thousand foot and one thousand horse; and giving out that he meant to seize on the nearest town in Lucania and the Carthaginian garrifon therein, he ordered them all to be ready for a remove. Having fet out in the night, he turned off towards Picenum, and, making the longest possible marches, proceeded directly towards his colleague, having left the command

mand of the camp to Quintus Catius, lieutenant- BOOK general.

XLIV. At Rome there was no less fright and B.C. 207 consternation than had been felt two years before, when the Carthaginian camp was brought close to the walls and gates of the city: nor could people well determine whether they flould commend or blame the conful for his boldness in undertaking fuch an adventurous march. It was evident that his reputation would depend upon the iffue, though there is not perhaps a more unfair method of judging. People confidered, with alarming apprehensions, that "the camp, in the neighbourhood " of fuch a foe of Hannibal, had been left with-" out a general, and under the guard of an army, "the strength of which had been carried away; "that the conful, pretending an expedition into " Lucania, when in fact he was going to Pice-" num and Gaul, had left his camp destitute of " any other means of fafety than merely the enemy's "want of information, as to the general and a " part of his army having quitted it. "would be the confequence if this should be "discovered, and if Hannibal should resolve, either " with his whole army to purfue Nero, whose entire " force was but fix thousand men, or to assault the " camp, which was left as a prey, without strength, " without command, without auspices?" The past disasters of this war, and the deaths of the two confuls in the last year, served also to increase these terrible fears. Besides, they reslected, that "all those " misfortunes had happened while there was but " one general and one army of the enemy in Italy; "whereas, at present, there were two Punic, wars "there, two numerous armies, and, in a manner, "two Hannibals. For Hasdrubal was a son of "the same father; Hamilcar was a commander " equally enterprifing, trained to making war against BOOK "the Romans during many campaigns in Spain, XXVII. " and rendered famous by a double victory over " them, by the destruction of two of their armies, Y.R.545. " and two of their ablest commanders. With respect 6 to the speedy accomplishment of his march from " Spain, and his address in rousing the Gallic clans " to arms, he had much more reason to boast than " Hannibal himself; because he had collected a " body of auxiliaries in those very places where the " other had lost the greater part of his foldiers "by hunger and cold, the two most miserable " ways in which men can perish." To all this, people, acquainted with the transactions in Spain, added, that " in Nero he would meet an antago-" nist with whom he was not unacquainted, one "whom, formerly, when caught accidentally in " a dangerous defile, he had baffled, just as he "would a child, by fallacious terms of peace." Seeing every thing through the medium of fear, which always represents objects in the worst light, they judged all the resources of the enemy greater, and their own less, than they were in reality.

> XLV. When Nero had attained to fuch a distance from the enemy that his defign might be disclosed with fafety, he addreffed his foldiers in a few words, telling them, that "no general had ever formed a defign " more daring in appearance, and yet more fafe in " the execution than his. That he was leading them " to certain victory. For as his colleague had not " marched against that enemy until the fenate had " given him fuch a force, both of infantry and ca-" valry, as fully fatisfied his utmost wishes, and those " troops more numerous and better provided than " if he were to go against Hannibal himself, the ad-" dition thus made to it, whatever might be its in-46 trinfic weight, would certainly turn the scale in " favour. As foon as the foe should hear, in " the

"the field of battle, (and he would take care that BOOK "they should not hear sooners) that another consul, XXVII. " and another army, had arrived, this fingle circum- Y.R.545. " stance would insure success. A war was, some- B.C. 207. " times, happily concluded by the spreading of a re-" port; and incidents, of light moment, frequently "impelled men's milds to hope or fear. That " themselves would reap almost the whole fruits of "the glory acquired by fuccess: for, in all cases, "the last addition made to the acting force, is sup-" posed to be most decisive of the business. That "they saw by the concourse of people attending, "with what admiration, and with what warm at-" tachment of all ranks, their march was honour-" ed." And, in fact, all the roads through which they passed were lined with men and women, who crowded thither from all parts of the country, uttering vows and prayers for their fuccess; intermixing praises of their glorious enterprise, calling them the safeguard of the commonwealth, the champions of the city, and of the empire of Rome; on whose arms, and on whose valour, were reposed the safety and liberty of themselves and of their children. They prayed to all the gods and goddeffes to grant them a prosperous march, a successful battle, and speedy victory: that they themselves might be bound, by the event, to pay the vows they offered in their behalf, and that, as they now, with minds full of folicitude, accompanied them on their way, so they might, in a few days, go out with hearts overflowing with joy, to meet them in triumph. Every one gave them warm invitations, offered them every accommodation, and pressed them, with the most earnest entreaties, to take from him rather than from another, whatever was requisite for themselves, or their cattle; in a word, every thing that was wanted, they with cheerfulness fupplied in abundance. Their kindness was equalled

by

BOOK by the moderation of the foldiers, who would not XXVII. accept of any matter whatever beyond their necessary Y.R. 545. occasions. They never halted on any account, nor B.C. 207. quitted their ranks to take their victuals, but marched day and night, scareely allowing themselves rest enough to answer the calls of nature. Couriers were fent forward to the other denful, to give notice of their coming; and to know from him, whether he chose that they should approach secretly, or openly, by night, or by day; whether they should lodge in the fame camp with him, or in another. It was judged best, that they should join him secretly in the night.

> XLVI. Orders were previously given by the conful Livius, that, on their arrival, each tribune should be accommodated with lodging by a tribune, each centurion by a centurion, each horseman by a horseman, and each footman by a footman. He confidered that it would not be prudent to enlarge the camp, left the enemy might discover the coming of the fecend conful, while the crowding together of additional numbers, into lodgings in a narrow space, would be attended with the less inconvenience, as the troops of Claudius had brought with them, hardly any thing, except their arms. Claudius had augmented his army with a number of volunteers: for many, both veteran foldiers discharged from service, and young men, offered themselves on his march; and, as they eagerly preffed to be employed, he enlifted fuch of them as, from their personal appearance, seemed fit for the service. The camp of Livius was near Sena, and Hasdrubal lay about five hundred paces beyond it. Wherefore, Nero, to avoid entering it before night, halted when he came nigh, and where he was concealed behind mountains. As darkness came on, his men, marching silently, were conducted into tents, each by a perion of his own rank, where they were hospitably entertained, amid mutual congratulations, and unbounded joy. BOOK Next day a council was held, at which was also XXVII. present, the prætor, Lucius Porcius Licinus. At this Y.R. 545. time, his camp was joined to that of the confuls. should however be noticed, that before their coming, he had often baffled and perplexed the enemy, leading his troops along the high grounds; fometimes feizing narrow defiles to arrest his march, sometimes harassing him by attacks on his rear or flanks; and putting in practice, indeed, every art of war. He now affisted at the council. Many were of opinion, that an engagement should be deferred until Nero might refresh his men, who were fatigued by their long march, and want of fleep; and also, that he should take a few days to himself, to gain some knowledge of the enemy. Nero, with the utmost earnestness, entreated them not, "by delays, to render "his enterprise rash in effect, when dispatch would " ensure its success. In consequence of a deception, "which could not last long, Hannibal lay yet, in " a manner, motionless; he neither affailed his camp, left, as it was, without its commander, nor " moved a step in pursuit of him. Before he should " ftir, Hasdrubal's army might be cut off, and he " himself might return into Apulia. Whoever, by "procrastination, allowed time to the enemy, would "thereby betray the other camp to Hannibal, and "open for him a road into Gaul, so as to enable " him, at his leisure, to effect a junction with Has-"drubal, and whenever he pleafed. They ought " to give the fignal, instantly; march out to battle, " and take every advantage of the delusion under " which the enemy lay; both the party in their " neighbourhood, and the other at a distance, while "the latter knew not that their opponents were de-" creased in number, nor the former, that their's "were become more numerous and powerful."-Accordingly the council was dismissed, the signal of battle M M 2

BOOK battle was displayed, and the troops immediately XXVII. marched out to the field.

Y.R.545. B.C. 207.

XLVII. The Carthaginians were already drawn up in order of battle before their camp. The only thing that prevented an immediate engagement was, that Haldrubal having, with a few horsemen, advanced before the line, remarked among the enemy fome old fhields, which he had not feen before, and horses leaner than any he had hitherto observed: their number also seemed greater than usual. On which, fuspecting what was the case, he hastily sounded a retreat; fent a party to the watering-place at the river, with orders to pick up, if possible, some prisoners, also to observe attentively, whether there were any whose complexions were more fun-burned than usual, as from a journey lately made; at the fame time, ordering another party to ride round the camp, at a distance, to mark whether the rampart had been extended on any fide, and to watch whether the fignal was founded a fecond time. Though he received accounts of all these particulars, yet the circumstance of the camps not being enlarged, led to a false conclusion: they were two, as before the arrival of the fecond conful; one belonging to Marcus Livius, the other to Lucius Porcius, and no addition had been made to the trenches of either, to make more room for tents within. One thing particularly struck that veteran commander, long accustomed to act against Roman armies, which was, that according to the information of his fcouts, the fignal was founded once in the prætor's campa and twice in the Hence he concluded, that the two confuls must be there; but how to account for Nero's having left Hannibal behind, perplexed him extremely. Of all things he could the least suspect what had really happened, Hannibal could be so blinded, and in a business of such magnitude, as not not to know where the general was, and where the BOOK army, whose camp stood facing his own. He sup- XXVII. poled that some disaster, of no ordinary kind, must Y.R.545. have hindered him from following; and he began to B.C. 207. fear greatly, that he himself had come too late with fuccour, that his affairs were too desperate to be retrieved, and that the same fortune which the Romans had met in spain, awaited them now in Italy. He even conjectured, that his letter had not reached his brother, and that, in confequence of its being intercepted, the conful had hastened thither to overpower him. Distracted by these doubts and fears, he extinguished all his fires, and, at the first watch, ordered his troops to strike their tents in filence, and to march. In the hurry and confusion of a movement by night, the guides were not watched with the necessary care and attention; one of them, therefore, stopped in a place of concealment, which he had before fixed upon in his mind, and the other fwam across the river Metaurus, at a pass with which he was acquainted. The troops, thus left destitute of conductors, strayed for some time through the country; and many, overcome by drowfinels and fatigue, stretched themselves on the ground in various places, leaving the standards thinly attended. Hasdrubal, until day-light should discover a road, ordered the army to proceed along the bank of the river; and, as he wandered along the turnings and windings, with which that river remarkably abounds, he made but little progress, still intending, however, to cross it, as soon as the day enabled him to find a convenient passage. But the farther he removed from the sea, the higher did he find the banks, so that not meeting with a ford, and wasting the day in the search, he gave the enemy time to overtake him.

XLVIII. First, Nero, with all the cavalry, came 'up; then Porcius, with the light infantry. While thev

BOOK they haraffed his wearied army by frequent affaults XXVII. on every fide, and while the Carthaginian, now stopping his march, or rather flight, had a mind to B.C.207. encamp on a high spot of ground, on the bank of the river, Livius arrived with the main body of infantry armed, and marshalled for immediate action. When the Romans had united all their forces, and the line was drawn out in army, Claudius took the command of the right wing, Livius of the left; that of the centre was given to the prætor. Hasdrubal, laying aside the design of fortifying a camp, when he faw the necessity of fighting, placed his elephants in front, before the battalions, and, befide them, on the left wing, he opposed the Gauls to Claudius; not that he had much confidence in them, but thinking that they were much dreaded by the enemy. The right wing, which was to oppose Livius, he took to himself, together with the Spaniards, on whom, as being veteran troops, he placed his principal reliance. The Ligurians were posted in the centre, behind the elephants; but the line was too long in proportion to its depth. A rising ground, in their front, protected the Gauls; and while that part of the line, which was composed of the Spaniards, engaged the left wing of the Romans, their right wing, stretching out beyond the extent of the fight, stood idle, for the eminence between them and the enemy prevented their making an attack, either on their front or flank. Between Livius and Hasdrubal a furious conflict began, and dreadful flaughter was made on both fides: for here were both the generals, here the greater part of the Roman infantry and eavalry, here the Spaniards, veteran troops, and acquainted with the Roman manner of fighting, and the Ligurians, a race of hardy warriors. To the same part the elephants were driven, which, at the first onset, disordered the van, and made even the battalions give ground; but afterwards, the contest growing hotter, and the shouts louder, they soon became disobedient to the BOOK directions of their riders, rambling up and down, XXVII. between the two lines, without distinguishing their Y.R.545. own party, and ranging to and fro, not unlike B.C. 207. ships without rudders. Claudius in vain attempted to advance up the hill, often calling out thus to his men, - "To what purpose, then, have we, with so " much speed, marched over such a length of way?" However, feeing it impracticable to reach the enemy's line in that quarter, he drew away some cohorts from his right wing, where the troops would not be able to act, and led them round behind the line. Then, to the surprise, not of the enemy, but of his friends also, he made a brisk attack on their right flank; and, fo quick were his motions, that almost at the same instant when his men appeared on the flank, they likewife attacked the rear. the Spaniards and Ligurians were cut to pieces on all fides, in front, and flank, and rear, and the havock in a short time reached the Gauls. These made very little opposition: for great numbers of them were absent from their posts, having slipped away in the night, and lain down in the fields; while those who were present, being exhausted by fatigue and want of sleep, and being naturally ill qualified to endure toil, had scarcely strength remaining fufficient to support their armour. By this time it was mid-day; and while they were panting with heat and thirst, they were slain or taken at the will of * the Romans.

XLIX. Of the elephants, more were killed by their guides, than by the enemy. These carried a knife, like that used by shoemakers, with a mallet; and when the animals began to grow furious, and to rush on their own party, the manager of each, fixing this instrument between its ears, on the joint which connects the head with the neck, drove it in